Iraq owes El Al $7M

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A United Nations commission has ordered Iraq to pay Israel's national airline $7 million (US) in compensation for economic damages suffered during the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

The sum was far below El Al's original claim of $70 million, which accounted for a loss of revenue due to the drop in passenger travel during the war and the cost of moving the fleet and altering flight paths.

"We're a little disappointed. We had incurred much greater losses," said company spokesperson Nachman Kleiman, adding that El Al is looking into the possibility of an appeal.

Kleiman said the airline does not know when it would receive the money.

The UN commission also approved payments to two Israeli families for property damage sustained during Iraqi Scud missile attacks. One family is to receive $135,000 and the other $66,000.

An Israeli official from the Ministry of Justice said that so far, the commission has approved damages amounting to about $45 million in response to 531 claims filed by 404 individuals and 127 businesses. Only about $3 million has been paid.

VENDORS PROTEST: Jewish street vendors protested last week at St. Peter's Square in Rome after they were banned from selling religious artifacts near St. Peter's Basilica. The ban was imposed for security reasons. Earlier in the month the Jews of Rome had other reasons to "protest" a decision by the Vatican. Please see accompanying story. [RNS/Reuters/photo]

Jews respond to sainthoods

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — For two very different popes – one who opened the way to Catholic-Jewish dialogue and one who was the last to confine Jews to a ghetto – the process toward sainthood has begun.

Pope John Paul II has taken formal steps toward the beatification of two of his predecessors, John XXIII and Pius IX.

No similar actions have been announced regarding Pius XII, the controversial World War II-era pope. But the Vatican denied "rumours" that Pius XII's beatification process had been delayed or postponed.

The cause "is at an advanced stage, it is proceeding normally and some of the documents relating to the beatification have already been printed," Jose Saraiva Martins, prefect of the Vatican's Congregation for the Causes of Saints, told reporters recently.

"Rumours that the cause has been slowed down are thus totally unfounded," he said.

By MIRIAM CHINSKY

When my cousin Molly and I were in Venice during our Italian dream bus tour, something unexpected happened.

As we strolled around the perimeter of St. Mark's Square in the shadow of the great domed basilica, the plaintive strains of Mein Stetele Belz, a Jewish melody from our childhood, drifted toward us above the hubbub of the crowd. It was a song that my Bubbie Yentl used to sing to me with a catch in her voice.

Molly and I looked at each other, and as if drawn by a magnet, we gravitated toward the sound. The sweetly sad violin notes soared and other instruments swelled the tone. We came to a dais where a small orchestra – two violins, a clarinet, a bass fiddle and a piano – was entertaining patrons at an elegant sidewalk cafe.

We settled on the broad steps beside the musicians. The tempo changed and Havah Nagilah burst from the podium. A spirited klezmer tune ended the set.

The orchestra continued to play – waltzes, semi classics, excerpts from Broadway shows – and we stayed, entranced, until it was time to rejoin our group for the boat ride back to the mainland.

After a few days in Florence, we boarded a train for Pietrasanta, a town in Tuscany.

Here another cousin, Shelley Robzen, a sculptor originally from Pennsylvania who has lived and worked in Italy for 25 years, has her studio. Her home is a one-room cottage, an eyrie in an olive grove far above the town with a stunning view of the sea. It was Shelley who had urged us to take this trip, to see "one of the most beautiful spots in the world."

All around, white-capped mountain peaks were covered, not with snow but with marble that lures sculptors from many countries.

Shelley's mother, Florence, was visiting with her from Pennsylvania, and Molly and I were based at a family-operated hotel in central Pietrasanta.

We were invited to join Shelley and her mom for dinner erev Rosh Hashanah. The drive up a narrow, terrifying road with hairpin turns and sheer drops filled us with admiration for Shelley's skill and we were thankful for our safe arrival at her home.

Vines heavy with kiwi sheltered the entrance. Inside, a festive table was set with a freshly ironed cloth and cheerful dishes.

As dusk folded over the slopes, Florence placed two small candles in a window, intoned the brachot and wished us Shanah Tovah.

On a Tuscan mountain, we sat down together, and as the flames burned, we dipped apples in honey and ate the lovingly prepared dinner.

The next morning, the first day of Rosh Hashanah, we accompanied Shelley and Florence to Pisa to attend services.

The synagogue, in a low-rise commercial area, was indistinguishable from surrounding office buildings. There was no exterior sign, but two young men in kippot stood at the door. Recognizing Shelley, they welcomed us.

On a wall just outside the sanctuary was a large, horrifically graphic painting of helmeted German soldiers standing over a bloodied mass. We later learned its significance.

Inside the synagogue, about 35 men and women of all ages sat, their seats divided by an aisle. We were offered siddurs printed in Hebrew and Italian.

The rabbi, Aaron Cohen, is brought from Israel each year for the High Holy Days.

The shul, built 400 years ago, is well proportioned and can seat about 120. The entire Jewish population of Pisa is currently 100.

Congregation president, Armando Castro, told us that Jewish continuity in Pisa dates back 1,000 years, second only in longevity to Rome. Services are held at the synagogue, known as Communite Ebraica di Pisa, on Friday nights. Sometimes there is a minyan, sometimes not.

"We try very hard to keep going," Castro said.

He explained about the painting. Three weeks before the Allies reached Pisa, the Germans came in.

"The general Italian population of the city was good to us," Castro said, adding that they hid many Jews and concealed the Torah scrolls and Aron Kodesh, and there was not much damage to the building. But when the Germans arrived, they rounded up all those Jews who were not hidden and massacred them. The painting commemorates that outrage.

In the afternoon, near the Leaning Tower, we saw a small Jewish cemetery, still in use, with stones placed on the sarcophagi and markers.

On the second day of Rosh Hashanah, Molly and I travelled by train to Florence, intent on seeing the Uffizi Gallery, Michelangelo's statue of David and the Sephardi synagogue.

We stood in line so long for the Uffizi that there was no longer time for both the David and the synagogue before the last train of the day departed at 7 p.m. for Pietrasanta. Although we wanted very much to see the David, something compelled us to opt for the synagogue.

On being told that it was a short walk, we set out on foot. Not knowing the city and with minimal Italian, we followed twisting streets, frequently inquiring for the "synagoga."

When we finally came to the address, there was nothing remotely resembling a synagogue and, as in Pisa, no outward indication. Only a man in what looked like a sentry box, gave us a clue, telling us to go around the block to a rear entrance.

There were only locked doors, but at last we spotted a few people dressed appropriately and discovered an unobtrusive entry into a formal courtyard facing an imposing structure. In the vestibule, we were asked to open our purses for inspection and admitted to the main sanctuary.

It was the most beautiful synagogue I have ever seen, with exquisite stained glass windows and intricate wrought iron; even the mechitzah was artistically devised. We could sit for only a few minutes. It was past 6 p.m. and we weren't certain of the distance to the train station. As we exited through the courtyard, a couple just arriving wished us Shanah Tovah.

Reflecting now, Molly and I realize what happened during our Italian dream. We had come to Italy as tourists looking for a new experience, but from the moment we heard Mein Stetele Belz in St. Mark's Square, something stirred inside and almost without knowing it, we were on a quest, a kind of odyssey, reaching to identify a part of who we are.

Rabbi takes Premier Harris to task on social issues

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Dow Marmur, spiritual leader of Holy Blossom Temple, is proclaiming his outrage.

In an open letter to Premier Mike Harris, posted just before the Christmas holiday weekend, Rabbi Marmur criticized the government of Ontario for not addressing the problems of homelessness and poverty in the province.

Rabbi Dow Marmur

In an interview from his downtown home, Marmur said he wrote the letter after spending time with guests attending the temple's weekly Out of the Cold program.

The program feeds about 100 people, 40 of whom often stay the night. The temple is one in a number of churches and synagogues, including Temple Har Zion, that take part in the project.

"These people would like to lead better lives, but they do not have the wherewithal. Living downtown, I cannot help but see the extent of the problem. It is not something that only exists elsewhere. A good number of Jews are homeless, or live in poverty."

Rabbi Marmur is one in a number of representatives from different faith groups who spoke to Harris about one year ago, "to try to reason with him. But I felt we were not heard," he said in the letter.

"When we tried to tell you that the institutions we represent lack the resources to provide enough for the needy, I didn't think you believed us. When we asked for your help, and pleaded for co-operation, we went away empty-handed and heartbroken.

"You know that we will not abandon those who come to us for help, but that is no reason for your government to neglect the needy in our midst. Life would be much easier for all concerned if we could work together. Without greater government involvement, our volunteers will collapse with exhaustion or give up in frustration. Self-help and community support can only be effective in the context of government action, not as a substitute for it," the letter said.

From the editor's desk

Misapplying Buber

It's my policy generally not to respond to negative articles or editorials concerning Israel that appear in other newspapers. On occasion, I make an exception.

Two weeks ago, on the day before Christmas there was such an occasion. The Globe and Mail published a commentary by Rick Salutin on its op-ed pages titled, Christmas Thoughts on Peace and Practicality. The article was brazenly malicious towards Israel.

Salutin shares some thoughts about Israel that were evoked by their association, for him, with Christmas. They were triggered by the memory, during a visit to Israel, of his inability to visit Bethlehem (hence the tie to Christmas) in 1962-63, which at that time was under Jordanian rule.

He laments that Israel did not adopt the teachings of the great Zionist and philosopher, Martin Buber. He cites a number of mini-passages from Buber's writings that were critical of the leaders of the Yishuv, pre-1948. He also invokes the usual inflammatory terms concerning Israel: "racist," "superiority and brutality," "mini-empire," "disaster," and of course, the old reliable, "South Africa's apartheid regime."

So blinding is the bias in the article that he even attributes "the state of repressive terror and counterterror [in Egypt as due to the fact that] much of its population never accepted that peace [with Israel] as just." He concludes with the less-than-subtle declaration on behalf of the Palestinians that "[T]his land is your land."

Space does not permit a comprehensive response. I will therefore deal only briefly with Salutin's appropriation of Martin Buber's writings to lend credibility to this grotesque, anti-Israel polemic.

Buber was indeed different in his outlook from the majority of his fellow Jewish settlers of Zion. Prior to 1948, he believed that a bi-national state in British mandatory Palestine was both viable and required.

Of course, Buber was disappointed that his bi-nationalist views did not prevail among the leaders of the Yishuv. But at least there was a debate on the subject, fiercely argued, among the many competing Jewish factions and leaders.

In the end, he accepted the majority will, though grudgingly and with worried reservations, because, as he wrote, "the decree of history" had been recorded. But equally disappointing to him was the fact that among the Arabs, there was no debate. The subject simply was not allowed to arise.

For example, on Nov. 11, 1946, five members of an Arab organization called Falastin el-Jedida, led by Fauzi Darwish el-Husseini, actually signed an agreement with the League of Jewish-Arab Rapprochement and Co-operation, in which Buber was an active member, calling for mutual trust and political equality between Arab and Jew. This was the first ever public initiative by Palestinian Arabs of accommodation towards the Palestinian Jews. Two weeks later, Husseini was killed by unknown Arab assailants. No such initiative was ever again undertaken by the Arabs.

Not only did the Arabs reject Buber's notion of a bi-national state, they rejected the notion of any state in the area for the Jews.

The assault on the nascent Israel by seven Arab states, was merely the latest proof of Arab hatred towards the Jewish state, as of 1948. There were numerous such proofs before 1948, and there have been numerous proofs since 1948.

After 1948, after the war in which Israel won its independence, Buber altered his political stance adjusting it to the altered political reality. Having failed to convince his fellow Yishuv leaders to establish a bi-national state, Buber called upon them to bring the country into a federation of near eastern countries. But this too proved impossible and impracticable because no near eastern federation would admit Israel into its midst.

By invoking Buber's writings and beliefs so selectively, with such obvious and transparent malice towards Israel, Salutin transgressed against the integrity of this "spiritual giant," as Levi Eshkol described Buber, as if a holy vessel had been polluted.

Buber articulated his core belief on Zionism in a letter he wrote to Mahatma Gandhi in February 1939. Gandhi had written three months earlier, barely two weeks after Kristallnacht that "Palestine belonged to the Arabs," and that the Jews should remain in Germany pursuing passive, non-violent resistance against the Nazis.

"We could not and cannot renounce the Jewish claim [to Palestine]," Buber forcefully wrote to the Indian statesman. Throughout his entire life, Buber never once wavered from his support of the Jewish people's, his people's, right to return to the land of Israel.

This immovable Buber belief, though, is something we will likely never read from Salutin. But Buber's answer to Gandhi applies with equal force to Salutin, who, in light of the last line of his article, it can be fairly inferred, makes essentially the same claim about Palestine as did Gandhi.

But just like Buber, we need not feel defensive about the Jewish return to the Jewish homeland, even though a great deal of work yet remains to make that return complete, true to the ethics of our fathers and to the dreams of our prophets.

CJC attends Tokyo war crimes conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadians don't think of themselves as especially patriotic or nationalistic, but when Mark Weintraub joined the Canadian contingent being recognized at a recent Tokyo conference, he felt differently.

The Vancouver lawyer, who is national chair of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, represented CJC at last month's International Citizens' Forum on War Crimes and Redress.

In his keynote address, Weintraub, 46, referred to the Holocaust, speaking of Jewish commitment to memory and of the Jewish belief in redemption through atonement.

"What is needed," he said, "is not only authenticity in the preservation of memory but memory anchored in purpose and meaning."

Both Jews and Japanese value tradition, Weintraub noted in a recent phone interview from his Vancouver office. "That's why the importance of remembrance and history, both good and bad, is a message I thought might resonate with the Japanese."

The three-day conference, held in early December, was organized by the International Citizens' Forum, a Tokyo-based group of Japanese lawyers, scholars and activists, and the San Francisco-based Global Alliance for Preserving the History of WW II in Asia, as an effort to confront Japan's actions in Asia before and during World War II.

One of their main goals is to obtain a formal apology from the Diet (the Japanese parliament), said Weintraub. Although there were war crime trials in Japan in the 1950s – initiated in part by the United States – since that time "the chapter of that book appears to have been closed," he said.

Mark Weintraub

Attention to civilian deaths and the use by the Japanese Imperial Army, and the then ruling power, of measures that contravened the Geneva Convention has been deflected by the notion of the Japanese as victims of atomic bombs dropped on Nagasaki and Hiroshima, he noted.

The CJC has worked for the past several years with the Canadian Association for Learning & Preserving the History of WWII in Asia (ALPHA), Weintraub said. Its British Columbia chapter president, Thekla Lit, extended the invitation to CJC.

No other Jewish organizations were represented, although conference participants included a Jewish psychotherapist from Germany and an American Jew who had been a POW in Japan.

Weintraub believes the conference was a "watershed" event, in that it brought together groups from both sides of the Pacific to share scholarship and strategy.

It also attracted international media attention, although coverage in Japan itself was minimal, he noted.

Among the events Weintraub participated in was a 90-minute march through the streets of downtown Tokyo.

"I was told that this was an extremely important psychological boost for the Japanese movement, who sometimes feel marginalized and threatened by the extreme right wing [members of whom demonstrated against the conference]."

It is extremely important that the conference not be seen in any way as a criticism of the Japanese people, Weintraub said. "In fact a significant presence [among the 600 attendees] were Japanese themselves."

A bonus for Weintraub was a Friday night dinner as an invited guest at Tokyo's synagogue.

"It was quite moving for all of us to come together, sing Shabbat songs and tell our stories over kosher meat prepared by a Japanese chef."

Other guests among the group of 15 included an official from the American embassy and a visiting academic.

One of the highlights of his trip, said Weintraub, was "to meet people who defy all kinds of categorizations." His Japanese translator, for example, has a son named Hillel and a father who did a PhD on anti-Semitism in the Christian Bible.

Co-operation urged between Orthodox Jews, archeologists

TORONTO — Archeology and Orthodox Judaism can be compatible, and members of each community must find a common language to explore Jewish history, says Dr. Aren Maier.

"Archeology and Orthodox Judaism are not complete opposites...though the process [of finding a bridge] is not always an easy one," said Maier, an archeologist and an Orthodox Jew.

Dr. Aren Maier

Maier recently spoke on Archeology and Religion, Partners or Antagonists? The View of a Religious Archeologist, as part of the Leonard Wolinsky lectures on Jewish life and education at the Centre of Jewish Studies at York University.

He is the director of the Tell es-Safi/Gath Archeological Project and a lecturer at the Martin (Szusz) Department of Land of Israel Studies at Bar Ilan University.

Maier noted that because early Israeli archeologists were secular Jews, archeology and religion remained two separate spheres of Israeli society. It is only in the past few decades that religious Israelis have joined the field of study.

The haredim view disturbing grave sites as a desecration, Maier said. The laws of tumat hamet, the ritual impurity of the dead, are very exacting. Once a site is used for burial, it is unfit for any other use. Even when a tomb is empty of human remains the site remains impure.

In Israel, the discovery of an ancient burial site causes political turmoil, he said. When word gets out that there is such a site, the haredi community opposes further digging on the grounds that it desecrates the dead.

Because the haredi community has political sway, Maier said, pressure is generally brought to bear and the excavations are stopped.

In fact, he said, the attorney general has established that human bones found in archeological digs must be handed over to the Ministry of Religion for Jewish burial and not be studied.

The issue is not a simple one, he noted. Israel has been inhabited for thousands of years and the number of people buried over time is incalculable. Human remains are not only discovered by archeologists but also by construction crews and others throughout the country.

In recent years, the haredi community has staged demonstrations such as the ones surrounding the excavation of the City of David south of the Temple Mount in the 1980s. The haredim claimed that the site contained grave sites. Demonstrations and acts of violence ensued to the point where the coalition government was threatened, Maier said.

In response to the haredi demands, parts of the dig were closed. But Maier noted that in fact there were no bones in the area in question and the closing of part of the excavation was seen as a great loss to archeological and historical study.

At the same time, he said, there is a moral imperative to take the haredi halachic concerns seriously as they are "problematic and must be dealt with in a fair manner."

Archeologists have not always faced this kind of opposition, Maier said. For many years, when bones were dug up during construction, archeologists were called, the area was excavated and studied and the bones were re-interred elsewhere.

"If you can't find acceptable Halachah to move bones, then you couldn't build anywhere in Israel," he said.

This can be seen in the Talmud, he pointed out. In several places, the Talmud says that "all graves may be moved except that of a king or a prophet," he said.

In fact, archeologists have found ancient tombs that appear to have been systematically emptied. They argue that as in all Jewish communities, the cemeteries in question were originally built outside the city limits. As the city expanded, the contents of the tombs – with all ritual impurities – were removed to a site further from the populated area to allow for expansion of the city, Maier said.

A few years ago, Israeli halachic scholar, Rabbi Yosef Shalom Eliashev, proclaimed that some graves could be moved to facilitate zorchai zebuur, communal need.

As an Orthodox Jew, Maier said he feels a personal need to find an interface between halachic Judaism and archeology. He feels there is halachic leeway, but also a moral and ethical requirement to act with respect for the dead.

Maier advocates careful excavation, followed by study and re-interment.

"It is important that Jewish sanctity of life play a role in modern Israeli archeology," Maier said. "This requires good will on both sides."

Museums urged to take stock of paintings' origins

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Museums should systematically examine works of art in their collections to ensure that they were not looted by the Nazis before and during World War II, says Glenn Lowry, director of New York's Museum of Modern Art.

He warned that they run the risk of losing the public's trust if even one tainted painting is found.

In a lecture at the Art Gallery of Ontario titled, Art on the World Stage, Lowry urged museums "to make available the provenance of their holdings."

Lowry, whose own museum became the subject of a lengthy legal battle over two suspect Austrian paintings by the late Egon Schiele, said that museums cannot rectify the wrongs of the past but are morally obligated to deal with the problem.

A former director of the Art Gallery of Ontario, he speculated that there are hundreds of looted works of art – from drawings to furniture – in the United States alone.

And, he suggested, such questionable works may be in Canada, judging by one or two claims that have been filed.

Citing examples of looted art in the United States, Lowry said that the Seattle Art Museum was caught in a scandal over a Matisse painting stolen from a Parisian Jewish family, while the Museum of Modern Art discovered that one of its Picasso pieces may have been seized from a Jewish collector in France.

The most contentious case, though, has embroiled the Museum of Modern Art. It revolves around two Schiele paintings, Portrait of Wally and Dead City, claimed by the descendants of the original Jewish owners, Lea Bondi, who died in London in 1969, and Fritz Grunbaum, who perished in a German concentration camp in 1942.

Glenn Lowry

This "unbelievably complicated" case, which remains unresolved, has gone into litigation and cost the Museum of Modern Art hundreds of thousands of dollars in lawyers' fees.

Having been impounded by the Manhattan district attorney, the Schiele paintings have never actually been exhibited and are currently in storage in the museum's basement.

Lowry, a specialist in Islamic art, explained that his museum did not hand over the disputed paintings to the claimants because works of art on loan are immune to seizure under any circumstances.

Referring generally to looted art, Lowry said that each case is unique and calls for a unique solution.

Lowry believes that an international panel of scholars should adjudicate such cases.

The court system, he said, does not offer a solution because it is expensive and not attuned to such issues.

By his reckoning, Russia – the successor state of the Soviet Union – has the largest collection of confiscated art in the world.

The Soviets grabbed a treasure trove from the Germans in the last days of the war and subsequently nationalized it.

Moscow, however, is amenable to returning art taken from Jewish victims of the Holocaust, he observed.

Posing a rhetorical question, Lowry asked why the issue has suddenly erupted.

There are basically two reasons. First, the 50th anniversary of World War II revived interest in that conflict. Second, documents relating to purloined art in Germany, France, Russia and the United States were recently unsealed.

Lowry said that the issue requires closure in the form of a statute of limitations.

"At some point, it has to be brought to an end."

VOLUNTEERS NEEDED

The Royal Ontario Museum needs weekly volunteer facilitators to work with families and school groups visiting the New Hands-on Biodiversity Gallery and the Discovery Gallery. Ideal for people interested in history, art, science or education. Four hours per week required. Training session Feb. 6. For an application (by Jan. 20) call Deborah, assistant co-ordinator of Education and Discovery Galleries at 586-8021, speak clearly, leave your name and phone number or fax 586-5562.

Be a puppeteer for Concerned Kids – a unique opportunity for an outgoing and enthusiastic person. Training is provided. Puppeteers go to schools during school hours and present an educational program. For further information, contact the Volunteer Centre of Toronto – North York Branch at 631-6117.

There are many isolated seniors in our community whose lives would be greatly enhanced by the gift of friendship from a volunteer visitor. As temperatures drop and sidewalks turn icy, many older adults spend more time indoors. You can brighten the life of an older adult through Circle of Care's Volunteer Visiting Program. For information, call Sandra Kingstone at 635-2860.

Canadian Cancer Society, North York Unit, has merged, moved and revamped. Volunteers are needed for many positions: drivers for delivery, escorting people to and from medical appointments, office assistants, public relations and promotions, fund-raising. Wary of the Syrian scenario

As of this writing, the negotiating teams of Israel and Syria are preparing to meet again in the United States. Last month they met in Washington. Earlier this week, on Jan. 3, they were to have resumed where they left off, but this time away from the U.S. capital, though not too far away, in Sheperdstown. By presidential helicopter, Sheperdstown is a 20 minute flight from the White House.

The discussions are now in earnest. After a hiatus in formal contacts of almost four years, the two sides have sprung like a tightly wound coil back to the bargaining table. The sudden, surprise decision last month to sit once again across from each other at that table, has lent an air of urgency to the discussions. We know however, the talks will proceed, as they must, with extreme caution.

The issues for Israelis are complex and inter-related: security arrangements, control of water sources, evacuation of settlements, compensation of settlers, determination of final borders and the nature of bilateral relations between the two countries.

Israelis have often referred to the Golan Heights as "the eyes" of the nation. For many of them therefore, to contemplate withdrawing from the Heights is to contemplate their own blindness.

According to a recent Canada-Israel Committee publication on the key issues of the peace process, "[a]s of the fall of 1999, only about 32 percent of Israelis were in favour, to one degree or another, of reaching a full peace treaty with Syria in exchange for withdrawal from the Golan Heights. A majority, about 62 percent remain opposed, to one degree or another, to relinquishing the Golan, even in the context of a full peace treaty with Damascus." Israelis, understandably, are wary of the uncertain Syrian scenario.

If an agreement between the parties is achieved, Prime Minister Barak has promised to submit it for ratification to the people of Israel by way of a referendum. In truth however, it will not fall to him to convince the Israeli public to step onto that narrow ridge of anxiety and risk in support of the Syrian scenario.

Ironically, that role, in a very real sense, will fall squarely on the shoulders of Syrian president Hafez al-Assad. Israelis will look to him to prove to them they should take that step.

The renowned American Middle East analyst Thomas Friedman made much the same point in an article he wrote for the New York Times last month. "Only Mr. Assad can tip the balance firmly in favour [of ratifying any agreement], and he can do that best by opening the way, right now, to contacts between the Israelis and the Syrians, who want peace and an opening of Syria to the world every bit as much as Israelis."

It is the democratic process in Israel that will ultimately determine whether a peace agreement with Syria is accepted or rejected. Though his regime abhors democratic process, Assad understands this irreducible truth about Israeli society.

Let us see how Assad now responds in trying to make Israelis feel more at ease with the prospect of an agreement and where he will lead his flock, as a result, in Sheperdstown.

Asks for organ donations

I praise Rabbi Reuven Bulka for his involvement and excellent efforts as chair of the organ donations committee of the Kidney Foundation for Eastern Ontario, and his opinion regarding Jewish organ donations. (CJN, Dec. 16)

As a matter of fact, I was asked on a number of occasions at the Organs Transplant section of the Toronto General Hospital why Jewish persons are against donating or refuse to donate organs. I was waiting for a religious authority to guide us halachically regarding organ donations and finally it materialized. I hope and pray that what the worthy rabbis indicated in the article will open the door for organ donations from the Jewish community.

I plead with you to please come forward and help all those, young and old, who are badly in need of organs for transplantation. Trust me that the lists are long, and people are dying before organs are made available to them.

We say: "He who saves one life is as if he saved the whole world." Let's do it and soon.

Defends CJN coverage

Re: Attacks CJN Policies (CJN, Dec. 16). In response to Richie Cohen's belief that secular Jews do not constitute part of the audience of this newspaper: indeed we do. I am a 28-year-old doctoral candidate who has not missed an issue in several years. I am proud to have had considerable Jewish education: I come from a Jewish home, attended Hebrew day schools through high school, had a bat mitzvah, and studied at an Israeli university.

Cohen states that this paper should not address secular Jews, as though we are (or should be) excluded from the Jewish community. This newspaper rightly indicates otherwise. From the perspective of a secular Jew, however, I feel the majority of articles examining the subject do so without an inclusive tone.

We are told either that we should be the target of extensive outreach campaigns, as though we are substandard individuals, or that we are hopelessly assimilated and should be abandoned in favour of more promising "Jewish candidates." Both views promote the idea that there is something "wrong" with us. But for many of us, "secular Jew" is not a contradiction. We define ourselves as "Jewish" in the first instance, as members of the Jewish community, and as proud Jews. This newspaper goes some way towards recognizing these issues.

Zangwill was noted author

Re: "A tour of literary Toronto" (CJN, Dec. 9). When Israel Zangwill visited Toronto, it was a side trip from Chicago. Both visits were on behalf of the Jewish territorialists who were looking for a land in which to settle Jews free of pogroms. Hector Charlesworth in his Candid Chronicles mentions this trip and also a meeting with Sir James J. Whitney to discuss with him the possibility of acquiring a stretch of land in northern Ontario.

By this time, Zangwill was internationally known and renowned as a distinguished novelist and playwright as well as a Jewish leader. Why then should your Bill Gladstone use the word "astonishingly" after mentioning that Zangwill spoke at the King Edward Hotel?

Don't blame aged

Re: "Caring for aging relatives" (CJN, Dec. 9). In recent years, there have been many articles and books written about aging relatives. In most instances, the older person is portrayed as a burden and a responsibility for adult children or other relatives "juggling" their lives. We refer to the "sandwich generation" – adult children being squeezed.

Are we really saying that there is no room in our lives for parents, grandparents and other relatives when they become ill or disabled? Have we become such an individualized society that community has no place?

Have we given any thought to the negative descriptions we use that take away an older person's personhood, dignity and self-esteem.

I am not saying that help is not needed in providing physical care. I am saying that intimate family relationships have become medicalized by our attitudes. And unfortunately, health care workers contribute to this phenomenon.

Let us get back to "honouring our mothers and fathers" in sickness and in health.

Approves mixed faith choir

Re: Mixed faith choir (CJN, Oct. 21, Montreal edition). May I suggest going beyond the technicalities of mixed faith choir and take a look at the following: Around the ninth century, Spanish Jews were forced by the Christians authorities to denounce their religious belief. What a fitting way it is to honour our ancestral heroes by having Christians (and anyone else) participate in the very prayer that was invented to absolve Spanish Jews from these forcefully obtained vows, Kol Nidrei.

At the least, this is historically connected and historical justice. At the most, this view requires selflessness from our religious leaders. Too much of a demand?

'A boy has to live too'

By RONALD RUSKIN

We didn't have money when I was growing up in Toronto after the war and there was no safe place to send a Jewish kid in the summer.

I was small for camp and my parents didn't have rich relatives or a rental cottage. They worked seven days a week in a drugstore and I was restless.

"Take him to Sunnyside," my dad told my mother. "Cool him off in the water. Already he's six and a wreck. Look – rings around his eyes. He's fidgety – I can't count pills with him – suppose I make a mistake and send the wrong prescription? Running all over my drugstore. He's driving me meshuge. It's the heat! Take him Sunday afternoon, why don't you? Buy him Honey-Dew. The drugstore won't be busy. Beach water will settle him and he'll sleep."

"Sleep – ? That's what worries you? How about polio?" my mother said. "It lives in water."

"He won't get a chill. Don't get excited."

"Excited? It takes a few drops of water. He doesn't know not to swallow. It goes to his mouth and nose and stomach. Then it's over."

Everybody was worried sick about polio. It was the worst disease. No one knew how you caught it. No one knew what to do when you got sick. Not even doctors.

There was no cure. One day you were fine, the next day you had a fever; a few days later you couldn't move your arms. After that, you couldn't breathe.

Then you died.

That's what my mother and my bubba said. I knew symptoms of polio by heart. If you recovered you wore special metal boots, walked with a cane, or one arm ended up shorter than the other.

Doctors locked you into an iron lung. You lived the rest of your life there. It had to be a terrible place, an iron lung; you stayed still and the lung helped you breathe. To make sure I understood, my bubba found a picture of a kid strapped inside an iron lung, and taped it to our fridge.

For weeks I had had dreams.

"Das is ein-lunge. Du vilst nicht, Reuben."

"Bubba I understood."

One hot day, my bubba felt sorry for me and bought me a bathing suit. She took two huge shissels to the porch, the kind you roasted several chickens in. She filled them with water, put my toochas in one, and my feesilach in the other.

"This is like you are swimming, Reuben. Go. Swim. A pool yet," my bubba said.

For a while I made believe. But it was no pool. Whenever I splashed, water vanished. Bubba got tired of filling the shissels.

After Friday night dinner, the three discussed polio and doctors. There was always a groisse gedilla about death. Who died? Who was going to die? Who already looked dead but was alive?

I came from a family of worriers. My bubba and mother were full-time worriers and my father was not far behind. The three argued nightly about tragedy. Secretly, they figured, worrying kept them happy. If they didn't worry enough, something awful would happen. If they worried overtime, something good would come.

It was either the dybbuk or pogroms, or polio, if they dropped their guard and enjoyed a day of life.

Meanwhile the polio epidemic peaked in summer. Like flies people dropped. A family friend, a doctor down the street, caught polio and died in two weeks. Radio announcers warned children – polio spreads in swimming pools and beaches. Any place where kids had fun, the polio would come.

My father wanted me to grow up to play baseball, to learn to swim ...to be normal. My mother and bubba worried I'd get walloped by a bat, drown, or die of polio.

"If F.D.R. caught it swimming at Campobello, and he's in a wheelchair the rest of his life," my mother asked,"what will polio do to my baby Reuben?"

"A boy has to live too," my father said. "It's summer. Water he needs. A beach. Fun, epis."

When I went to bed, my sheets turned sticky from fear. I heard them shout and argue.

"A sickness will visit Reuben," Bubba warned.

That night I dreamt I was locked in an iron lung for the rest of my life and had to eat strained prunes through a straw.

The following Sunday, my mother took me to Sunnyside beach with Bubba. They didn't take their eyes off me, except for a few minutes when they saw a fat lady drinking Honey-Dew with her fat husband on shore.

"Would you kindly keep an eye on our little one. He won't leave."

"I won't go out far," I said.

"Shveig. Stay quiet beside those two nice fat people," Bubba whispered.

"Why?"

"Because fat people don't sink. Farshteish du?"

I stayed there. They were nice fat people. They asked if I wanted a hot dog. I said I was a Jew and didn't eat treif. Afterwards they let me go deep into the water up to my neck. When Bubba came, they said someone should teach me to swim because I almost drowned.

Bubba slapped me until I saw stars. She toweled water off me like she was cleaning candlesticks. Pieces of skin flew off.

Bubba shook me. "Now, the truth."

"What truth?"

"Gott Reuben. Did you?" Bubba asked.

"What?"

"When you went," mother pointed to people splashing in the water. "Did you swallow?"

"No."

"Are you sure?"

"Maybe, a bissel," I said.

"But it tasted fine."

I looked down at the beach with tears in my eyes. Hundreds of goyim were having a great time, running into the waves. Others threw themselves head-first into deep water or had piggyback fights. None of the goyim died as I could see. They ate foot-long hot dogs and fries, they sipped Honey-Dews, and Vernors. They swam. I had to sit an hour after an egg sandwich before I moved one foot.

"Don't go fast to the beach, Reuben," Bubba said.

"Why?"

"You get bad cramps."

"Bubba. Sitting, I get more cramps."

Bubba knucked my head until I saw pinwheels.

Why was it that goyim knew how to have a good time at a beach while Jews watched, argued, and worried?

My father decided to send me out of the city with Auntie Leah and Uncle Ellis who had no children. Auntie Leah ran a clothing store together with her husband Ellis, the tailor, and my bubba, her sister.

They lived a block from my father's drugstore. In August, Auntie Leah rented an apartment on Erie Road in Crystal Beach. The apartment was a single room with a stove, icebox, and curtain in the middle separating the kitchen from a bed and cot.

Uncle Ellis smoked Sweet Caporals first thing in the morning. He said it assisted his indigestion.

After breakfast we crossed Erie Road to Crystal Beach Park. There was a playground with swings, seesaws and a slide that spiralled down. There was also a train that took you around the amusement park for a quarter.

Morning to night you smelled fries, waffles, popcorn, doughnuts, hotdogs, and hamburgers. At night, the sky filled with coloured lights and music. People danced, jived, or roller-skated in the covered pavilions.

Auntie Leah wasn't afraid of polio. She didn't keep kosher. She played bingo, gambled for real money and stayed up late.

Whatever she liked she ate and she let me do the same.

Carloads of Jews came from everywhere to Crystal Beach. They acted like Aunt Leah and Uncle Ellis – staying up late, playing cards, walking around in swimming trunks all day. Some played horses at Fort Erie; others drank beer and slept on cottage hammocks.

If anyone was worried, I never guessed.

People there also vacationed in Buffalo or Niagara Falls. Daily, a boat came to a long pier that stretched beside the roller-coaster.

"Can I go on that boat, Auntie Leah? To Buffalo," I asked.

"Someday, Reuben. When you have enough money."

At Crystal Beach the water was shallow. You sat in it and felt waves push you side to side, over the bumpy ridges of sand below the water. After lunch I slept on a beach-towel. People didn't chalesh over getting sun, eating ice-cream, or spending money.

Crystal Beach was heaven and I forgot my woes.

Uncle Ellis taught me to be still, to float in water.

"Float. Dream away." Uncle Ellis said. After my nap Auntie Leah put me on the kiddy-coaster, the bumper cars, and for a special treat, gave me a glass of Cronfeldt's loganberry, or a pony-ride.

At the end of August Uncle Ellis died.

No one knew exactly why. I was home from Crystal Beach on Labour Day when I heard the news.

They held the shivah at our place.

I saw the faces of mourners from Crystal Beach. They came and kissed Auntie Leah and they cried.

Auntie Leah was young and, I thought, very beautiful.

Opinions

Wake up, Ontario!

Some weeks ago, the United Nations Human Rights Commission came down with a decision that was exactly what had long been expected: It ruled that the case of Arieh Waldman versus the province of Ontario in the matter of discrimination against Jews and other minorities, their claim was found justified.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In February 1996, Arieh and Vallry Waldman of Toronto had charged Ontario with discrimination. The Waldmans had taken this route because the Supreme Court of Canada had ruled that it was constitutionally permissible for Ontario to give exclusive support to Roman Catholic schools, because the history of Confederation made this practice an integral part of Canadian existence.

The Court was frank in acknowledging that Jews and other minorities were indeed discriminated against and that such discrimination was inconsistent with the equality provisions in the Charter of Rights. But it said the 1867 Constitution Act had preference over the current Constitution.

Let me say quickly what has been repeated numerous times before: The desire of the Waldmans – backed by the overwhelming opinion of the Jewish community – is not to deprive Roman Catholics and their schools of the funds they have enjoyed for so long. It is aimed only at giving that same privilege also to non-Catholic citizens

It is noteworthy that Ontario is the only jurisdiction in Canada that extends funding to only one religious group. Each of the other provinces and territories either has an entirely secular school system, or provides public funding for a variety of denominations.

Canada is one of 87 countries that permit individual complaints under the covenant. Such rights having been sustained by the decision of the United Nations Human Rights Commission are now exposed to the world as having been violated, and by long practice and various precedents, Canada is obliged to proceed in accordance with the commission's decision.

Unfortunately, there are no constitutional means of having a federal government force a province to proceed along the lines of international obligations – but I believe that both the federal government and the public ought to do everything not to let this matter rest. Only a few weeks are left in the deadline set by the commission, and Ontario must respond, and respond positively.

Of course, there's a pragmatic question: Where will the money come from? For a good deal of money is indeed involved.

My suggestion (which is not original) is to begin supporting non-Catholic religious schools by compensating them for expenses that are due to all children in Ontario, regardless of their religion; matters that have to do with public health, and with instruction in those subjects that are not specifically Jewish. This would be the first step and it would go a long way toward rescuing the honour not only of Ontario, but also of Canada.

We cannot have it both ways – be a member of the United Nations and then snub it, or have one of our provinces do it without objection. Time is short, and Ontario is morally obligated to act, for if not now, when?

Golan behind the first referendum

More than just determining the fate of a strategic part of Israel, the planned referendum on the Golan Heights represents a bold new democratic move for the country. Or does it?

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Before the elections last spring, Prime Minister Ehud Barak made his promise of separate referenda on future peace treaties with Syria and the Palestinian Authority a cornerstone of his campaign. It was a commitment made previously by his predecessors, Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres. Since taking office in July, Barak has repeated his pledge.

Unlike Canada, Israel has never held a referendum. How democratic the whole exercise will be is still to be determined. Until recently, the issue was entirely theoretical. But the sudden resumption of high level negotiations between Israel and Syria last month, and Barak's readiness to give up the Golan Heights, have changed everything.

With the country so split over the Golan issue, the lead-up to the referendum – and its results – will likely be deeply divisive. As difficult as the campaign will be, it will be nothing compared to what will happen if the government one day actually forces Golan residents to leave the communities where they've lived for the past 33 years.

For now, as the Knesset prepares referendum legislation, there's little consensus on how the vote will be conducted. Even before the talks began in Washington, intense debate erupted over such issues as what the required majority in the referendum will be, who will decide the wording of the question, how voter eligibility will be established, how the campaign will be financed, what its duration will be, and whether advertising will be allowed. Some of these questions are, of course, familiar to Canadians, who for the past quarter-century have seemed to be perpetually in the aftermath of one Quebec referendum or in anxious anticipation of the next.

So far, the most contentious issue is what majority is needed. Predictably, the government says a score of 50 percent plus one vote is sufficient for approval. Opponents say that given the gravity of the matter, 60 percent of referendum participants or 50 percent of all eligible voters should be necessary.

Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein said there is nothing in the law preventing the Knesset from deciding that a special majority is required for approving a Golan withdrawal "in light of the importance of the matter." But he strongly criticized any idea of disqualifying Arab citizens from voting in the referendum, as was proposed by one Likud MK.

As an attempt at letting people have their say on a specific issue, a referendum is quite laudable. Too bad this first time around, it could not tackle a more mundane subject – like whether El Al should fly on Shabbat or whether to proceed with the much-disputed Trans-Israel Highway project.

As with any referendum, ballots will be cast by many who are ill-informed or motivated by factors barely connected to the issue at hand. In this case, the results will be determined largely by factors unrelated to whether it makes sense to give up a vital asset and transfer 18,000 Jews from their homes in exchange for a treaty with an ailing, ruthless dictator. (I make little attempt to conceal my skepticism.)

In the end, more critical to the outcome will be how much the government pays off various groups – like Russian immigrants, Shas and Israeli Arabs – in exchange for their support on referendum day. And indeed for these sectors, the referendum constitutes an irresistible vehicle with which to extort more money from the government.

Inevitably, the government will appeal to voters to support giving Syria the Golan, if they want peace and a bright new Middle East. By implication, opponents will be portrayed as anachronistic naysayers whose position will lead to war. This despite equally sound reasons – too many to list here – for not endorsing a deal with a totalitarian regime whose recent history engenders little confidence.

One interesting twist is that the one sector the government felt was in its pocket – Arab citizens – may now think twice before automatically endorsing Israel's surrender of the Golan. During the same week that talks began in Washington, it was reported that Arabs living in the Galilee stand to lose major land holdings in the event of an Israeli pullout from the Golan.

As the army will have to transfer its bases and other defence installations to the neighbouring Galilee, it will require the expropriation of huge tracts of land, much of it now in the hands of Arab communities.

Strangely, for all the intense debate over the mechanics of the referendum, there's been virtually no talk so far on what happens if the government loses the vote

The end of naiveté

The sudden announcement of the resumption of negotiations between Israel and Syria, followed by the first round of talks, left more questions than answers.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In response to immense American pressure, both sides agreed to resume negotiations.

Perhaps the resumption of negotiations reflects a hidden agreement that Prime Minister Ehud Barak will give up all of the Golan, or perhaps it resulted from Hafez al-Assad's fear that continued stalling would close the door to any chance of regaining the Golan.

Either way, in Israel, the resumption of negotiations with Syria did not trigger the extremes of euphoria and anger that might have been expected.

A great deal has changed in the past few years. Israelis are no longer naive, eager to embrace any agreement, regardless of the details. Since 1993, even the enthusiastic supporters of Land for Peace have become far more realistic.

The soaring hopes that accompanied the signing of the 1993 declaration of principles agreement in Oslo disappeared in the waves of Palestinian terrorism, and the continued hate-speeches.

In contrast to the Rabin-Peres-Beilin approach, based on dreams of a "new Middle East" that had no relation to reality, Ehud Barak knows his mandate is limited to agreements that provide clear and visible benefits for Israel and thereby ensure an end to war and terrorism.

At the other end of the spectrum, opponents of withdrawal from the Golan, including many of the 20,000 residents, are not panicking. They have learned that the beginning of negotiations does not necessarily mean Israeli capitulation.

Any draft agreement must be submitted first to the Israeli public for approval in a referendum.

It is clear that Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk a'Shara's opening statement in Washington, in which he attempted to rewrite history to whitewash years of Syrian violence, and his refusal to shake Barak's hand (even in private sessions), only served to increase skepticism.

To change this situation, the Syrians will have to go a long way in reassuring the Israeli public that their intentions are honest.

The first issue for Israelis is, as always, security.

If the Golan is eventually returned to Syrian sovereignty, it will have to be entirely demilitarized, with Syrian tank divisions and other weapons moved far away, north of Damascus.

As a former IDF chief of staff, Barak could not allow Syria to recapture the dominant position on the Heights unless its ability to wage war against Israel was neutralized. This also means the development of multiple early warning systems, in space, in the air and on the ground, to ensure that Israel will never be taken by surprise again.

The vast majority of Israelis also expect a peace agreement, and indeed, that the resumption of negotiations will lead to a complete end to terrorist activity in Lebanon.

Without a Syrian decision to disarm Hezbollah, including the closure of the special runways at the Damascus airport that are used by Iran to transfer weapons and to rein in other terrorist groups in Lebanon, no agreement is possible.

"Normalization," in the sense of an end to the denial of Israel's legitimacy as a Jewish State, and acceptance of its right to exist, is also a key element of the package.

This means that beyond a Barak-Assad handshake and the opening of embassies in Damascus and Tel Aviv (or better, Jerusalem), barriers to tourism and trade would have to be removed.

Israelis may be willing to give up sovereignty in the Golan, but in exchange, they will expect to continue to visit, crossing the border without significant barriers and going on to Damascus, Aleppo, and even driving through Syria and into Turkey.

In dealing with Syria, Barak knows that he must avoid the mistakes made with Egypt and the Palestinians, when acceptance was neither mutual nor broad.

The Egyptian policy of Cold Peace (and even Cold War), has made the Israeli public far more wary of vague promises made during negotiations. The foundations for acceptance must be laid during the negotiations, and so far the Syrians are marching in the opposite direction. Despite the headlines proclaiming a breakthrough, the gaps between Damascus and Jerusalem remain immense.

If the negotiations become more intense, and the outlines of an agreement begin to emerge, the stress lines in Israel will also tighten.

However, for now, Israelis remain confident that this prime minister will not give away the store.

The Kirshner File

Great Jews of the millennium

With a new century and a new millennium upon us, a list of the 100 most influential and/or greatest Jews of the past 1000 years may be an exercise of value and curiosity.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

It's a subjective, once-in-a-lifetime inventory, based on personal preferences and, I should add, on ideas generated by Howard Adelman of York University and Kenneth Green and Derek Penslar of the University of Toronto. I assume full responsibility for the final selection.

For background, I consulted a variety of sources: The Encyclopedia Judaica, The New Columbia Encyclopedia, American Jewish Desk Reference, The Blackwell Dictionary of Judaica and the Oxford Paperback Encyclopedia.

These influentials and/or greats – rabbis, philosophers and Zionists – are not listed in any particular order of importance, though I have tried to group people by category.

The first 50:

Elijah Ben Solomon Zalman (Vilna Gaon) – Scholar of towering intellect. No topic which had a bearing on Judaism eluded him: Bible, Talmud, Mishnah, Zohar, Shulchan Aruch.

Moses Maimonides (Rambam) In extraordinary feats, he catalogued Jewish oral law and produced a penetrating commentary on the Mishnah.

Joseph Ben Ephraim Caro – Wrote Shulchan Aruch and Beit Yosef, masterpieces of rabbinic literature.

Isaac Ben Solomon Luria – Kabbalist who prepared the ground for the Messianic ferment of the Shabbatean movement.

Judah Ha-Nasi – Redactor of the Mishnah. Spearheaded the resettlement of Eretz Yisrael after the destruction of the Second Temple.

Judah Halevy – Philosopher/poet/rabbi whose Sefer Ha-Kuzari still resonates.

Moses Mendelssohn – Guiding light of an intellectual revolution, the Enlightenment (Haskalah).

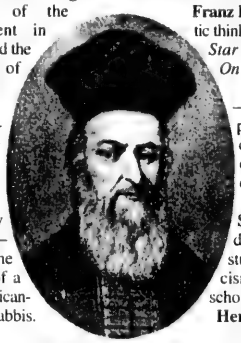
Moses Soncino (and his descendants) – The Jewish Gutenbergs. As printers, they published the first editions of the Hebrew Bible.

Abraham Isaac Kook – One of the first Orthodox rabbis to apply talmudic learning to contemporary issues, notably modern Zionism.

Abraham Geiger – Leader of the Reform movement in Germany. Convened the first-ever meeting of Reform rabbis.



Elijah Ben Solomon Zalman

Solomon Schechter – Architect of Conservative Judaism. Instrumental in recovering Cairo Genizah.

Joseph Dov Soloveitchik – Called "the rav," he was the mentor of a generation of American-trained Orthodox rabbis.

Isaac Mayer Wise – Founding father of American Reform Judaism and the first president of Hebrew Union College.

Theodor Herzl – Founder of modern political Zionism. His visionary pamphlet, The Jewish State, laid the theoretical foundations of Israel.

Moses Hess – His book, Rome and Jerusalem, was a harbinger of 19th century Zionism.

Leon Pinsker – Auto-Emancipation, his prescient pamphlet, envisaged Jewish self-determination in Palestine.

Ahad Ha-Am (Asher Ginsburg) – Advocate of Israel as the spiritual homeland of the Jewish people.

Eliezer Ben Yehuda – Lexicographer who revived spoken Hebrew in what was to be the State of Israel.

Chaim Weizmann – Zionist leader and chemist whose lobbying was a factor in the issuance of the 1917 Balfour Declaration.

Vladimir (Zvi) Jabotinsky – Zionist Revisionist theoretician whose acolytes helped drive the British out of Palestine.

David Ben-Gurion – Declared statehood as Israel's first prime minister and led Israel in its formative years.

Menachem Begin – Negotiated Israel's first peace treaty with an Arab state, Egypt.

Yitzhak Rabin – Chief of staff during the Six Day War. Made peace with the PLO and Jordan.

Shimon Peres – A builder of Israel's military machine, and an initiator of the Oslo peace process.

Salo Baron – Historian whose 18-volume work, A Social and Religious History of the Jews, placed the subject within the context of general history.

Martin Buber – Philosopher (I and Thou) who saw the relationship between human beings/God in terms of a direct dialogue.

Abraham Heschel – Philosopher and rabbi whose books on Kabbalah and Chassidism are widely considered as the standard works.

Gershom Scholem – The academic who turned the study of Jewish mysticism into an important scholarly field.

Henri Bergson – Philosopher whose works – Matter and Memory and Time and Free Will – stand as eternal monuments.

Isaiah Berlin – Professor of social and political theory at Oxford. Wrote Four Essays on Liberty and The Hedgehog and the Fox.

Hermann Cohen – A founder of the neo-Kantian division of the Marburg school of philosophy.

Emmanuel Levinas – A phenomenologist, he delved into "the other person" in metaphysical inquiry.

Leo Strauss – Philosopher who ruminated deeply on the Holocaust and Israel and who probed the underpinnings of Spinoza's and Mendelssohn's philosophy.

On the assumption that my selections will be questioned, I now add a supplementary list, composed of the 140 Jews or individuals of Jewish descent who have won the Nobel Prize since 1905. Some of them will be included in my next column.

The Nobel laureates who are not on my list are, among others, Paul Ehrlich and Barbara Sussman Yallow in medicine; Albert Michelson and Murray Gell-Mann in physics; Adolph Von Bayer and Robert Huber in chemistry; Paul Samuelson and Milton Friedman in economics; Elias Canetti, Nelly Sachs and Shmuel Agnon in literature; and Alfred Fried and Rene Cassin in world peace.

Next week: The second batch of influentials and/or greats.

Seeking Jewish spirituality

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

The philosopher Thomas Molnar states that, at present, religion is accepted and even flourishes, but only as a kind of "psychic weekend from too much materialism, exacting work and blatant immorality."

Molnar's criticism is acute; religion today has become a kind of lowest common denominator in many circles, an escape from pornography and politics, or just that big bad world outside.

But escape is not the stuff from which spirituality is founded. Whether it is liberal Jews tired of a stripped down version of Judaism organized mainly around the bar mitzvah and a smattering of ritual, or at the other end of the spectrum Orthodox Jews whose Shabbat joy is organized around the shul kiddush, there has been a feeling for several years now of the spiritual train having gone far off the track.

The cliches regarding this derailment are powerful and, to a great extent, true. Modernity has assaulted truth, exploded the meaning of words, shredded the comforting grip of authority, laid simple faith to waste. Children, often mirroring the adults they see, are unable to imbibe a pure faith because they are so tossed and turned by how the post-Kantian universe has turned language, love and truth inside out. Sometimes one despairs that students have been so thoroughly moulded by Hollywood and Wall Street that any recovery from relativism and MTV is unlikely.

And yet there are moments that give rise to the possibility of reviving Jewish consciousness in young people. One such moment occurred to me last year. Just after Rosh Hashanah, a girl who had not outwardly manifested any real drive for the spiritual or interest in deeper discussions of meaning, told me that her rabbi's sermon had been dominated by references to the Clinton/Lewinsky scandal.

"I hear enough of that stuff every day. For the few days a year I go to shul, I want to be free of all that. I want something else," she said.

Her comments are noteworthy for their challenges as well as their contradictions.

Firstly, as assimilated as she feels, she still has a desire for something other than the nightly news when she goes to shul. Thus contrary to how we might think, Jews do not want their Judaism served up diluted. They want intensity and meaning. They want spiritual guidance and insight.

I once had a student, a good sincere Orthodox boy, aged 16, complain to me that his rabbi – a good, sincere Orthodox man of 50 – talks of absolutely nothing that he cares about at all, be it relating to a God who seems silent and absent, be it confronting his inner turmoil about a whole host of emotional issues, be it the question of what is real and how to gain access to it, be it autonomy versus authority.

But on the other hand, my female student goes to shul a few times a year and expects some kind of spiritual fulfilment. If you talked to your spouse three times a year, we'd call that marital breakdown. And though my student wants something, she doesn't know what it is. What are we looking for? What do we hope to find? Aren't we seeking salvation, for the redemption of our lives and the perfection of the world?

Jewish spirituality in our time has often become a very shrunken thing. It does seem that the Protestant enthusiasts have done this far better than we have – they have the ability to talk about their saviour in a way shorn of embarrassment and filled with delight. At the birth of a meaningless millennium, the problem remains, as Erich Fromm once noted, ourselves.

Popular challah recipes

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

One of the great mysteries of Shabbat is that there actually could be challah left over after the holy day has finished. But if you happen to find yourself with some challah on Sunday morning, there is no shortage of ideas and recipes for what to do with it.

Of course, the old standard is challah french toast. Here are a couple of recipes. One calls for eggs, clarified butter and cream [http://sunsite.auc.dk/recipes/english/o0320402.html], another for milk, cinammon and nutmeg [http://www.pathfinder.com/FoodWine/trecipes/788.html]. Top with jam, maple syrup, honey, sugar or eat plain.

If you want to try something a bit different, there are three ways to make challah kugel at the Jewish-food Recipe Archives, including one that calls for half a cup of Amaretto liqueur [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/kugindex.htm].

Looking for less known (but even more decadent ways) to dispose of your excess challah? Chef Caprial Pence wouldn't dream of creating her Raspberry Dessert Bruschetta without six slices of challah [http://www.caprial.com/recipes-cc-014-2.htm]. But nothing compares to White-Chocolate Challah Pudding [http://www.globalgourmet.com/food/special/1999/figs/ pudding.html]. Who would ever dream of combining challah with yet more eggs, vanilla extract, heavy cream, milk, sugar and two cups of white chocolate?

And with Chanukah gone, Purim can't be too far off. I was surprised to learn that there is a variation of challah just for that holiday. A Purim challah is prepared in the shape of a hamantash, with apricot or strawberry preserves spooned into the centre [http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/Susieq/purim1.htm]. Or try some edible challah baskets which are specially shaped to hold rolls, hamantaschen, pastries and fruit [http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/Susieq/basket1.htm].

Baking a challah can be time-consuming, but there are recipes like the Busy Woman's Challah that will help speed up the process [http://jewishrichmond.com/recipes/r001.html]. (In this one, the dough is placed in the refrigerator to rise overnight before the bread is to be baked.)

When Shoshanah Zakar bakes a challah, she doesn't focus on speed. Zakar has conducted workshops on baking challahs and hers is one of the best sites for delivering the nitty gritty. But Zakar's site goes much further when she describes the baking of challah as much more than simply mixing and kneading and baking [http://www.dubrow.addr.com/~dubrow/Havienu/html/courtyard/kitchen/].

"There is a recipe that tells you the ingredients and mixing instructions for making challah. If you follow it you will likely come up with a good loaf of challah, but that is not the real point…If you prepare the loaves with the intention of doing it for the sake of God, of doing it as a mitzvah that will help make the Shabbat meal a blessing, you will end up with Shabbat challot. You will find yourself bound up in the twists of their meaning, and a greater sense of the power and holiness of Shabbat. The time you spend making challah is a good time to pray, to allow yourself to explore the 'deeper meanings' hidden within the process, and to become more aware of God's presence."

Promise or prayer?

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

Can a slave be freed against his will? This question is crucial to understanding the exodus from Egypt.

This week's Torah reading begins with God telling Moses that He remembers the covenant He made with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. He then tells Moses that He also hears the cries of the Jewish people who are enslaved by the Egyptians. For these two reasons, God tells Moses He will free the Jewish people.

But why does God need two reasons to redeem the Jewish people? Isn't either the covenant with Abraham, in which He said that the Jews would be freed after 400 years of slavery, or the suffering of the Jewish people, reason enough on its own?

Two commentaries grapple with this question. Rashi implies that it is only because of the covenant that the Jews are redeemed. It is now the time God promised Abraham the exodus would occur. The cries of the Jewish slaves are tangential, mentioned only to determine the amount of punishment the Egyptians will receive for their cruelty.

To Rashi, history is already set with Abraham's covenant, and the prayers play no role in freeing the Jews from slavery.

The Ramban takes a very different approach. To him, the 400 years were only a minimum amount of time for the slavery. In His covenant with Avraham, God made no promise about the maximum time the Jews would spend in slavery. The Jews would be freed only if they did not sin further and proved worthy of leaving.

In fact, the Jews in Egypt were sinners and were not worthy at first, and so their slavery was extended by 30 years. It was only the prayers of the Jews, when they called out in pain, that moved God to free them. To the Ramban, it is only the prayers that free the Jews; God's promise to Abraham pertains only to the details of how the Jews would leave Egypt.

I think that what lies at the heart of this disagreement is the question I started with: Can a slave ever be freed against his will? Is freedom a process that requires personal involvement, or can it be achieved passively?

According to Rashi, the freedom from Egypt was preordained, and the actions of the Jewish slaves were irrelevant. They would be led out of Egypt into freedom, even if they were undeserving or disinterested. Whether they liked it or not, these slaves would become what history demanded of them.

According to the Ramban, the exodus may have been promised to Abraham, but the slaves would not be freed until they were active participants in the process. They had to do something to make themselves worthy of leaving.

The comments of the Ramban tell us something about the true nature of freedom. One of the elements of slavery is passivity, the refusal to take control of one's destiny. Even if God removed the Jews from Egypt, if they were not involved in the process of achieving freedom, they would still be slaves in their hearts.

By praying, by crying out to God, the Jews showed an interest in becoming free, and participated in their own freedom. It is only at this point that they were worthy of being freed.

What is true freedom? To the Ramban, passive freedom is the freedom of a straw man, a person who is empty of emotion and initiative. To be truly free, a slave must do something to resist his masters, even if it's only a silent, whispered prayer.

Tribute to courageous man

Dr. Elkhanan Elkes of the Kovno Ghetto*, by Joel Elkes (Paraclete Press, $13.95 US – Paper).

Books
Bernard Baskin

This brief memoir is a tribute to a courageous giant of the spirit, Dr. Elkhanan Elkes, who served as the elected head of the Jewish Council of the Kovno Ghetto. At the heart of this searing chronicle is information derived from a secret diary by Avraham Tory, a former law student. These writings were eventually placed in five wooden crates and hidden beneath the concrete foundation of a three-storey building. They describe events from the German invasion of Lithuania in June 1941, to the final destruction of the ghetto in July 1944.

In the face of relentless and murderous pressure, the council tried in every way possible to save Jewish lives. Dealing with the Nazi death machine on a daily basis was a fearful responsibility, and an ultimately hopeless task.

At first the council reacted naively to Gestapo deception and duplicity. When asked to supply the names of 500 educated men to work on archives, the council readily complied.

"The streets leading out of the ghetto were filled with young lawyers, engineers, chemists, journalists, teachers and technicians, some with a diploma tucked under their arm in case their status as intellectuals was questioned. However, before the day was over, 534 men had been rounded up, taken away onto trucks, and driven away. None of the 534 was ever seen again."

In accord with a Nazi order, 30,000 inmates assembled for the dreaded selection process in the ghetto square. "Dr. Elkes tried to intervene, responding to cries and appeals, moving this family, this group, this person from right to left …Now and then, when he was overcome by a fit of weakness, those near him asked him to sit down, to regain his strength, or offered him a piece of bread. He refused, muttering 'Thank you, thank you, gentlemen; terrible things are happening here; I must remain standing on guard, in case I can be of assistance.'"

The next day, Dr. Elkes obtained permission from Rauca to enter the small ghetto to save another hundred people. There, however, the guards fell upon him. Savaged, trampled, and beaten with rifle butts, he fell to the ground unconscious, bleeding profusely from a head wound. His efforts to save a small number of Jews had almost cost him his life.

On Dec. 1, 1941 the commandant of Einsatzgruppe 3, reported to his superiors his satisfaction over the completion of the initial phase of his task. Between June 22 and Dec. 1, 137,346 Jews had been killed in Lithuania.

In 1944, Elkes made the following astonishing statement (paraphrased) to Wilhelm Goecke, chief of the camp: "I am old, I have no fear of death; you can kill me on the spot. However, I have this to say to you. You listen to the radio, and we listen to the radio. You and I know that Germany has lost the war. No miracles can help you. Your patriotism cannot serve your fatherland or your party – certainly not by murdering thousands of Jews. But you can alleviate your conscience if you leave us alone. Don't supply trains for our evacuation. Postpone it until the Russians arrive…We are an ancient people with long memories and remember decency in times of peril. Whatever your answer, we will not forget." Unhappily, there was no positive response.

Exhausted, ill, frail, a dedicated leader to the end, Dr. Elkes expired in October 1944. He despaired at his inability to save lives. "Such a life," he sighed, "is unseemly, I can't watch the suffering, I must be away."

Dr. Joel Elkes, Elkhanan's son, a distinguished physician and scholar, is a former professor and psychiatrist-in-chief at the Johns Hopkins University.

Reproductions of striking illustrations by heroic ghetto inmate Esther Lurie, as well as unpublished photographs from the author's collection, add poignancy to this depiction of Jewish suffering that is at the same time a tribute to a heroic and unforgettable human being.

Orthodox Zionists seeking own needs, says Haifa U prof

By REBECCA NADLER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO —Orthodox Zionists in Israel today are talking less about sacrificing for the whole Jewish nation and more about their individual needs and dreams, according to Menachem Kellner, the Wolfson Professor of Jewish thought at the University of Haifa.

Kellner, the inaugural lecturer of the Dr. Max and Gianna Glassman Israel Exchange Scholar Lecture, recently spoke at the University of Toronto on the topic of Messianic theology in modern Israel.

He said there is less talk of redemption and more talk of self fulfilment in Israel today, which is a reflection of the changing times.

Kellner said the naturalist school of Messianic thought views Messianic times as a gradual historical process leading to the recreation of the Jewish state. In the naturalist framework, Israel is the Jewish homeland and returning to the land of Israel is an integral part of the Messianic dream.

The supernaturalists view the Messianic age as a catastrophic time that will bring about a utopian age unlike anything that has ever existed. Trust in God and repentance are the prerequisite conditions for the coming of the Messiah. Israel is the Holy Land, but the State of Israel is of no particular significance, he said.

How Jews react to historical events depends on which school of thought they belong to.

For Messianic naturalists, the Holocaust and the subsequent declaration of the State of Israel were signs that times had changed and the Jews must once again walk the stage of history. This view led to religious Zionism.

Against this backdrop, Kellner began to describe the state of the Messianic movement in Israel. He said the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin dealt a strong blow to all of Israel, but it was a death blow to the right and groups such as Gush Emunim, which wanted to hold on to the West Bank and Gaza.

For Gush Emunim, "giving back land to the Arabs is a hopeless battle against God's will. They see the state as the beginning of the redemption, a process that can be retarded but not stopped. Relinquishing any land is spitting in God's face…acts that are bound to fail," Kellner said.

He said some leaders of Gush Emunim and other Orthodox Messianic groups hold to the view that Jews are in the midst of the Messianic process and it will continue.

He said, however, that other leaders, like Beni Elion, argue that the Jews missed a historic opportunity in 1967 when they were united; they could have initiated the coming of the Messiah, but Jews are no longer sufficiently united and the opportunity has lapsed.

Most people, Kellner said, whether they like it or not, agree that there will be a Palestinian state in the near future. "Anyone in Israel who voted for [Ehud] Barak knew they voted for an Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, much of the West Bank and the Golan. This is not a question of right or wrong but a recognition of what happened."

With the change in the philosophical and political landscape, Kellner sees a waning of interest in the writings of Rabbi Abraham Isaac HaCohen Kook, the father of Zionist Messianism, and an increasing interest in the writings of Rabbi Yitzchak Reines, the founder of Mizrachi, the Orthodox Zionist movement.

Kellner said Rabbi Reines saw the dream of a Jewish state as an opportunity for Jews to live better Jewish lives – a Jewish state would be a way for Jews to protect themselves physically and reinvigorate themselves spiritually.

Kellner asserted that this newfound interest is paralleled in the vocabulary of religious Zionists, in that there is less talk of redemption and more talk of self fulfilment. People talk less about sacrificing for the whole and more about their individual needs and dreams, he noted.

As an Israeli religious Zionist, Kellner thinks that the great success of Zionism is the normalization of the Jewish state. "With success, Israel now faces the most important battle the Jewish people will fight in the near future. Will a normalized Israel bear any relationship to Jewish laws?"

Israel must choose between becoming a state like all other states, Jewish only because its founders were Jewish. Or the state that Kellner advocates, one like Canada – "open, liberal, multicultural, but one that does not lose its unique identity."

God, not coincidence exists: author

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A man of routine one night unexpectedly takes a different route home. Hearing a woman's screams and the sounds of a scuffle, he overcomes his own terror and chases away a potential rapist. The woman he saves is his daughter.

Miracle or coincidence?

A young girl hands apples through a concentration camp fence to a despairing boy. Years later, two people meet on a blind date. They realize that they were the boy and girl.

Miracle or coincidence?

Journalist, speaker and writer Yitta Halberstam and psychotherapist Judith Leventhal have no doubts at all about the answer. There is no such thing as a coincidence, they say flatly.

The authors of a series of best-selling books, Small Miracles, Small Miracles II, and Small Miracles of Love and Friendship, brought their message to a program sponsored by Aish Hatorah, and held at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto.

The Talmud says that "there is not a toe stubbed that is not divinely ordained," Halberstam said. But people have to be able to open their hearts and minds to recognize that.

She told the story of a man who saw a leaf fall, even though there was no wind or rain to cause it. What had happened was that on the ground was a tiny worm, hot and miserable. It prayed to God for help, and "He Who has mercy on all creatures sent a leaf to protect it. But man only sees the leaf, not the worm."

People have limited vision, she said. "What a caterpillar sees as the end of life, God calls a butterfly."

Coincidences, she said, provide a practical influence and moral guidance, if only people would be open to the message being sent. "When coincidences happen, it is God speaking to us."

Leventhal said that "the more awake we are [spiritually], the more we invite small miracles into our life."

We invite God, and miracles, into our lives by "tapping into our spiritual passion…by loving ourselves and our neighbours."

Leventhal told the story of a young girl who was badly hurt in a car accident. Lying in intensive care, she was afraid and desperately lonely, because her parents were themselves badly hurt and unable to be with her. A nurse, Martha, took pity on her, and spent much time with her, bringing her small gifts, playing games, and cheering her up.

Many years later, the little girl had become a nurse. She had a patient who never had visitors and was very lonely. She began to give her special care. Over the time they began to reminisce. The patient was Martha.

"Coincidence or miracle?" Leventhal asked. "Definitely a miracle."

Summer kallah led to position at Kolel

Spotlight

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Shirley Herman, special projects co-ordinator for Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning feels that fate led her to her job.

Herman, who has worked at Kolel for three years, says that about five years ago, she attended a summer kallah (study session) sponsored by Kolel, and she enjoyed spending time with other Jewish people who wanted to learn.

"I was involved in Solel Congregation [in Mississauga] but I wanted to branch out. I volunteered to administer a Kolel tribute dinner, and then this job opportunity came up. It was perfect for me. It allowed me to be involved beyond what I was doing."

Among her duties, she co-ordinates all of Kolel's non-semestered activities, such as the recent gala honouring Kolel's major donors, and the upcoming 10th anniversary screening of Half a Kingdom, a film about the equality of women. "I find a location for the event, make arrangements for guest speakers, organize the schedule of ads, work with caterers – everything involved with arranging the event."

Shirley Herman

Herman, who grew up in England and worked in retail management before coming to Kolel, says she likes what Kolel stands for "in terms of learning opportunity. There is something here for everyone, and students do not have to be part of an organized group.

"I have seen one woman, who, as a result of her involvement here, has had a bat mitzvah. She was not previously affiliated, and she knew nothing about her roots. She had a life changing experience."

Some students are on "a serious learning path, and others enjoy taking one course a semester. People can get involved as little or as much as they want."

Kolel, which has about 5,500 people on the mailing list, and about 250 students a semester, has five people on staff under the direction of Rabbi Elyse Goldstein. "It is a small staff that does some wonderful things. It is clearly a team that works together for the good of the organization, and as a result, for the good of Judaism."

Herman's husband Gavin is on Kolel's board of directors and is chair of the board of Camp George, the new Reform camp. Her children, ages 16 and 13, are in youth groups.

Working in the Jewish community is important to her, she says, "because it maintains a connection to my Jewish roots. As well, when my children see me involved, they want some involvement as well. It is a family affair."

Canadian Jewry flourishing: Abella

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Jewish community is the fastest growing in the Diaspora and is among the most affluent, educated and integrated ethnic communities in the country, says York University professor Irving Abella.

In a new Key Porter edition of A Coat of Many Colours, Two Centuries of Jewish Life in Canada, Abella writes that "while American Jewry is in decline and British Jewry is in a state of crisis, Canadian Jewry is flourishing."

Canada today is far different from "the benighted, xenophobic, anti-Semitic country it was a generation or two ago," he writes.

Noting changes since he wrote his first introduction to the book 10 years ago, Abella says it is "unthinkable" that Judaism cannot hold its own within a competitive, pluralistic religious environment.

A former president of Canadian Jewish Congress, and co-author of None is Too Many, Abella writes: "Canadian Jews live in a society in which Jewish lives are not in danger. What is in danger, according to some scholars, is Jewish life."

Abella notes that "today's community worries more about rates of assimilation than rates of anti-Semitism. Its greatest concern is for its children and grandchildren: will they remain Jewish?

"Burgeoning assimilation rates in the United States are a growing concern to Canadian Jews. In North America, living as a Jew is only one option among many. And when living as a Jew is a choice, the community must be able to offer its children more than simply an invitation to survive... What are we Jews about? What dream do we fulfil by surviving?"

Abella also writes that "as for all Canadians, life for Jews is influenced by the vastness of the land.

"If Jews suffer from an excess of history, then Canadians suffer from an an excess of geography--and Canadian Jews suffer from both.We are the world's largest small nation. That sense of both the country's smallness and its immensity has contributed to a sense of insecurity and marginality that has dominated the Canadian Jewish community for too much of this century."

In the 21st century, Abella hopes that Judaism and Jewishness can succeed and flourish in a free and democratic Diaspora environment.

Jewish officer helped liberate concentration camps

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Those who went through hell and came out with their religion intact are the real heroes of World War II, Meyer Birnbaum asserted at a recent Aish Hatorah program.

"I got the medals. They brought up children in a Jewish way. They saved their souls. I don't know if I could have done that."

Birnbaum was speaking about his experiences as an officer in the American army, where he was involved in the liberation of several concentration camps, including Buchenwald, and worked as a liaison between the army and the survivors.

His recent biography, A Soldier's Story, talks about his experiences as a religious Jew in a not-always sympathetic army, as well as the terrifying, pitiful or mind-numbing stories he heard from those survivors he met.

He told the hushed audience of over 400 at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation that he has so much respect for the survivors that "If a rabbi comes in when I am talking, I don't stop my speech. If I see someone come in with a [concentration camp] tattoo, I stop."

The Satmar rebbe had the same philosophy, Birnbaum said. When he was leaving Israel to move to the United States, one of his followers asked him where he could go for a blessing.

"Go the shul," the rebbe said, "and when you see someone putting on his tfillin and he has a number on his arm, ask him. His brocha has more weight than mine."

Even his parents and his sister didn't believe the stories he told them. There was the story of a 16-year-old boy who asked how to do tshuvah – the boy had obeyed his father's order to kill him, so that the boy could survive.

Birnbaum talked about the bodies burned under railroad tracks. The ashes used as fertilizers. The lampshades and purses made out of Jewish skin by the wife of the Buchenwald commandant.

But mostly Birnbaum spoke of the spark of faith that somehow remained in those who had survived the unspeakable.

Two teenage boys refused to board the last train leaving the camp before the Russians took over because they had vowed to never again desecrate Shabbat.

The gentle Klausenberger Rebbe, who had survived the war but lost his wife and children, used Birnbaum's tfillin. Then hundreds of men lined up for the chance to wear them for a minute each.

On the other hand, there was the man who came up to Birnbaum and spit at him. "Where was God?" he demanded. Initially shocked at "this blasphemy," Birnbaum said that he came to recognize that he had no right to pass judgement on those who had lost their faith.

An emotional Rabbi Aaron Hoch, education director of Aish Hatorah, began and ended the evening by asking the audience to recognize those war veterans and Holocaust survivors present in the room.

There are two types of witnesses to the Holocaust, said Rabbi Hoch – those who were liberated and those liberated. "One kept their faith through the fire of the ovens, the other through the fire of bullets."

Birnbaum's affirmation rang out to the listeners. "I was the first in the camp. I stand before you as a witness to what I saw – not to what I heard [from someone else]."

As emotionally stirring was a short address by Holocaust survivor Gerda Frieberg, who introduced Birnbaum. During their imprisonment, she said, they tried whenever they could to observe Jewish tradition.

"On Yom Kippur, we didn't line up for food. It was our act of defiance. They took away our homes, our families. They couldn't take away our faith."

She described tearing up flowers growing around the entrance to the camp to give to the liberating army. "It was only the beginning of our battle to find a new life."

New Hadassah president aims to strengthen group

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — By electing Marion Mayman president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, the organization, founded in Ottawa in 1917 by Lillian Freiman, has returned to its roots.

Mayman is also the first national president from Ottawa since the 1930s, and the first to be elected in a general election. "It is exciting for the people here; we've brought history back to Ottawa," she said in a telephone interview from Ottawa.

Her priority throughout the three-year term, she said, is to be totally accessible, and she plans on meeting with leaders across the country. "This is how we are going to bring strength to the organization.

"I want to hear directly from the members to find out what they want. It is important to have a grassroots membership. Individuals are more important than the whole. I want to be there and reach them.

"When members are consulted, it becomes their own organization. We have 15,000 members across Canada, and it is important to try and consult all of them."

Marion Mayman

Mayman, a "Zionist who knows how important it is to help Israel," leaves shortly for the World WIZO conference in Israel, which involves 54 federations from around the world.

The organization supports Israeli projects such as day-care centres and youth clubs, as well as Assaf Harofe and Hadassah hospitals.

She says that Hadassah-WIZO faces special challenges. "Because Israel is now perceived as less threatened, Zionism is no longer as powerful a drawing card. Israel's need for our support has not diminished, but the nature of the support that is required has evolved, and that message must be conveyed in new ways.

"We have to make sure Canadian women appreciate the reasons why they should commit again to Hadassah-WIZO."

A chronic problem for all organizations in the '90s has been to attract volunteers, she said. "It speaks well for us, that we had four women running for president

"People are busier these days, but there are ways to divide tasks. If they can associate with the organization, and they know that people are there to help them, they will want to give their time. We have to try and work around working women," said Mayman.

Her intent, she said, is to build the organization on past strengths. "We have to take what we did in the past and make it relevant to today."

Pride of Israel celebrating its 95th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As the Pride of Israel Synagogue begins the new millennium, the congregation is celebrating its own milestone.

In 1905, a group of 10 Polish immigrants established the Pride of Israel Sick Benefit Society, laying the foundation for what would become a viable synagogue.

Even after 95 years, the synagogue remains a separate entity, with membership obtainable only as a benefit of joining the society.

Finance chair Sylvia Singer, 80, has lived through seven decades of change at the Pride. A past chair of the synagogue and past vice-chair of both the shul and the society, she remembers pre-OHIP days when the society paid $600 a year for its own doctor to look after some 300 members.

Singer and her husband Marvin, 81, the vice-president of the society and a past chair of the shul, were honoured for their combined total of 135 years of involvement, at the Pride's recent gala 95th anniversary dinner.

"It's part of my life. It always has been. I enjoy it," said Sylvia, who has ushered on Saturday mornings for more than 20 years.

Sylvia's Polish-born father, Robert Segal, joined the society, or landsmanshaft, shortly after immigrating with his young family almost 80 years ago. He became president of the society, and his English-born wife Jennie – who had met Robert while travelling – was one of the founders of the ladies' auxiliary.

Rabbi Robert Rhodes

When Sylvia was a student at Eastern High School of Commerce, her father volunteered her services as note-taker at the board meetings.

"None of the men wanted to take minutes," she recalled. "I was at every meeting. We hired doctors, and I used to write cheques for them. They had to visit every member."

Although the Pride didn't have its own building until 1947, services were held for years in rented premises.

From 1947 – when the Pride of Israel Temple became a legal entity – until 1963, services were held at 578 Spadina Avenue. The society had purchased the building for $12,000.

Before that time, "we rented every place that was available," said Singer. Among them, she remembers, were Sonshine's Hall above a bowling alley, and Brunswick Talmud Torah.

The congregation moved north in 1963 and opened the doors at its present location at 59 Lissom Cres. in 1968, after an interim period of renting other premises.

It's still a benefit society, noted Howard Stone, president of the society. "We do provide all kinds of benefits."

Sick benefits and a credit union have been phased out, but cemetery plots have been offered to members since the society first bought land in 1907.

"What I see happening," said Rabbi Robert Rhodes, spiritual leader of the congregation, "is the society taking on a very different role, getting more into the needs of people for social action and activism in terms of health care.

"I think there's an area where health care, spirituality and religion all overlap. That's a potential avenue for the society to take up."

The congregation, which serves 750 member units, is "growing like wildfire," said the rabbi, who was preceded at the current site by rabbis Ira Book, Harold Lerner (the congregation's longest serving spiritual leader died in 1998), Sherman Kirshner and most recently, Aaron Flanzraich, now rabbi of Beth Sholom Synagogue.

The congregation includes a high percentage of older members, but new members are almost exclusively couples in their 30s and 40s with children, said Rabbi Rhodes.

"I think there's an excellent future for another 100 years here."

Military affairs specialist carves out niche for himself

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

David Bercuson has never tasted combat, but his knowledge of military affairs is formidable.

Now 54, he has carved out a niche for himself, not only in academia but in the wider world as well.

Bercuson, a historian, is author, co-author or editor of 11 books on the military. He is also director of the University of Calgary's Centre for Military and Strategic Studies and a special advisor to the minister of national defence.

Not bad for a guy who has never even worn a uniform.

In hindsight, Bercuson, a Montrealer whose late father Joseph was a reservist in the Canadian forces, thinks he may have benefited from a tour in the army.

"It may have been a good experience for me to have spent a year or two in the military after high school.

"I may have made a decent general," he chuckled. "But I'm not unhappy I was not in uniform."

He has no reason for regrets. In just a few short years, Bercuson has become a historian and consultant of national repute.

David Bercuson

A specialist in Canada whose association with the University of Calgary stretches back three decades, Bercuson has produced a blizzard of books, more than 30 at last count, and an avalanche of monographs on three interrelated topics: Canadian politics, Canadian defence and foreign policy, and Canadian military history.

A graduate of Sir George Williams University (Concordia) and the University of Toronto, where he received his PhD, Bercuson's newest book is Blood on the Hills: The Canadian Army in the Korean War, published by the University of Toronto Press last September.

The book, he feels, fills a void. "The Korean war has always been ignored because people thought there wasn't much to learn from it. So why bother? There is a lot to learn from that war. Korea set the pattern for all post-World War II conflicts. In fact, Korea is the norm when it comes to such wars because it was fought for limited political objectives. It wasn't an unconditional surrender type of war."

Bercuson, who has written widely on Canada's military, is also the author of Canada and the Birth of Israel, the Keegstra Affair and The Winnipeg Strike: 1919, based on his doctoral thesis.

Currently, he is working on two books, the first on the sinking of the German warship Bismarck, and the second on the Princess Patricia Light Infantry.

In general, Bercuson devotes upwards of four days a week to his writing. He is very grateful to his wife, Barrie, for indulging him. They have two children and live in Rockyview, a Calgary suburb.

A full professor since 1978, Bercuson enjoys teaching immensely. "I love it. It's my lifeblood. Even when I was dean of the faculty of graduate studies from 1989 to 1996, I never stopped teaching. For me, to stop teaching is to stop breathing."

Bercuson, who also writes a weekly syndicated column for the Calgary Herald and delivers political commentaries for CBC radio and television, has headed the Centre for Military and Strategic Studies for the past three years.

Its mandate is to promote and develop excellence in military, security and defence studies from a Canadian and international perspective.

In response to demand, the centre now offers an MA in strategic studies geared for military personnel. Students can complete the degree by correspondence or on campus.

Judging by the tripling of its budget over the past few years, the centre appears to have a bright future.

Bercuson's expertise has not gone unnoticed by the federal government.

From January to April 1997, he advised the minister of national defence on the future of Canada's armed forces. Bercuson wrote a paper on the subject, and is pleased to say that several of his recommendations were followed.

Although the Canadian forces have undergone an improvement of late, they are not really combat-ready, Bercuson suggested.

"The Canadian military today is not – and I repeat not – capable of achieving the goals set out for it in the 1994 White Paper."

Canada's armed forces, he added, are undermanned and vastly underfunded.

In his opinion, Canada can afford a bigger military machine. A vital military is necessary if Canada is to be respected in world councils.

A few months after delivering his report, Bercuson was appointed to a monitoring committee on change in the Canadian forces and the department of national defence. His findings will be released shortly.

Meanwhile, Bercuson is studying two additional issues: leadership and the role of the militia.

Looking back at his career, he credits his mother, Sylvia, who lives near Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., for having whetted his appetite for history."She introduced me to books about history. I owe her a great deal."

As a teenager, Bercuson, whose family immigrated to Canada from Romania about a century ago, attended Monklands High School. He hated it. "It was one of the worst experiences of my life," he said without elaborating.

An indifferent student, he hit his stride following his second year at Sir George, when he was given a chance to try out for the demanding honours history program. Switching from American to Canadian history, he rose to the challenge, winning a silver medal for academic achievement.

He is grateful to three professors who helped and encouraged him – Steve Sheinberg and Frank Chalk of Concordia and Craig Brown of the University of Toronto.

Bercuson said he chose Canadian history as a major for pragmatic reasons. "It was purely a marketing decision. If I was going to get a job in a Canadian university, it would be with Canadian history. So I was stuck with it."

His fascination with military history is bound up with World War II and the process by which "Hitler was defeated, my people were saved and what role Canada played in that struggle."

With World War II as his reference point, Bercuson eventually broadened his interest in military affairs, and the rest, as they say, is history.

Israel with the good & bad -that exist there...

...Does not give one the right to...defame that country

...his unhidden hatred for the Israeli state

אלף חדש- ושלום איתו:

Peace Now Friends gets new co-president

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

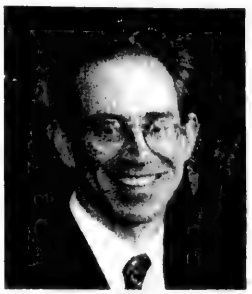
TORONTO — Erez Anzel, the newly appointed co-president of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, was a paratrooper in the Israeli army.

"I was actualizing my Zionist ideals by being willing to defend the state," said Anzel, a 46-year-old software developer who saw no action as a soldier.

Born and raised in New York City, where he was active in the Hashomer Hatzair Zionist youth movement, he immigrated to Israel in 1974. Before settling in Israel, he worked as a volunteer on Kibbutz Harel. He was there just after the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

In 1981, he and his wife, Dorete Sivkin of Montreal, who made aliyah in 1973, left Israel to be near their aging parents.

Anzel, who served in the army from 1976 to 1978, was stationed mainly in Israel, but occasionally he was posted to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. His commanding officer was Avraham Burg, now Speaker of the Knesset.



Erez Anzel

Following demobilization, he continued his studies at the Technion in Haifa, graduating with a degree in civil engineering.

While on campus, he almost lost an eye after being attacked by supporters of Rabbi Meir Kahane's Kach movement. The incident occurred as Anzel, a member of Peace Now, was distributing leaflets supporting the rights of Israeli Arabs to study at universities in Israel.

"One guy knocked me down and the others kicked me," he said. "I was swarmed."

Anzel established the identities of his assailants and brought the information to the police, but they were uncooperative and no one was charged.

As co-president of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, he wants to increase its base of support and disseminate its message.

"Most people in the community would support our goals if they were aware of our existence," he said. "The time is ripe to make ourselves known."

Anzel said he hopes to reach more students as well as unaffiliated Jews.

By his reckoning, Peace Now's work is more crucial than ever now that Israel is attempting to conclude peace agreements with the Palestinians and Syria.

Peace Now, he added, will try to persuade Prime Minister Ehud Barak and the Israeli public to accept "the painful compromises that are necessary to reach a lasting accommodation" with the Arabs.

Anzel believes that Israel and Syria will eventually sign a peace treaty. "Giving back most of the Golan Heights is a very steep price to pay for peace, but it is well worth it. The strategic value of the Golan is not as important as peace."

An agreement with Syria, he predicted, would pave the way for additional treaties with other Arab countries currently in a state of war with Israel.

His idea of a final settlement with the Palestinians parallels the unofficial 1995 Beilin-Abu Mazen plan under which Israel would relinquish 90 percent of the West Bank.

About 70 percent of Jewish settlers in the West Bank would remain under Israel's sovereignty should this scheme be adopted, said Anzel.

Settlers who evacuate settlements should be compensated by the government, he said.

"Relinquishing territory is a bitter pill to swallow, but we have to respect the rights of the Palestinians. We need to give them enough land for a viable state, with a viable economy, which is to Israel's benefit."

Peaceful relations with its Arab neighbours will give Israel greater security than the status quo.

"As an old saying goes, a land of peace is better than a piece of land. One of the most important mitzvot is to seek peace."

Anzel, the father of two children, succeeds Simon Rosenblum, who recently joined Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, as director of policy.

Elder law helps seniors to understand rights

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the last year or more, Toronto lawyer Boris G. Freesman has concentrated on elder law, which now constitutes the major part of his work.

"There have been fantastic changes in society, people are living much longer, and they are having longer and healthier retirements. It's a different world."

Boris G. Freesman

Looking after the legal affairs of his own father, who died as a result of Alzheimer's disease, has made him sensitive to the needs of seniors, he said.

Freesman, 60, an immigrant from Chile, said he is "shocked" at the number of Jewish seniors who have come to him for advice he feels they could get from their children.

"There is a huge gulf between parents and children, and I find this more prevalent in the Jewish community," he said.

Some of those who have asked him for advice said their children lived out of town, or if in town, were too busy with their own lives.

He said one of his main concerns since he began to specialize in elder law is that seniors often don't understand that any power of attorney they gave prior to 1992 may not be as binding as they think.

Ontario legislation now provides for a durable, continuing power of attorney that has set limits and parameters, Freesman said.

For example, under this legislation, a senior can say who should have such power if she or he becomes mentally incompetent.

"The worst thing a person can do is set down conditions which the one affected does not want and does not agree with."

The important thing, he said, is that people must make the decisions about power of attorney while they are healthy.

Freesman has presented free forums on elder law at the Bernard Betel Centre and at the National Council of Jewish Women.

Rabbi takes Harris to task over handling of social issues

To be fair, Rabbi Marmur admits that it is not a problem of this particular government. "I am not implying that another government could solve it. It is not a party issue. It is a reaction to the callousness in which we live."

The federal government is giving the provinces "a raw deal, but the chain has to break. Ontario has the means to address the problem," he said.

"We always hear about how prosperous Ontario has become [in the latter part of the century], but at the same time we still have an unnecessary gap between the rich and the poor. Paying less taxes may please the voting majority, but it contributes to a society where injustices are glaring. Society is judged, not by how well the strong are doing, but how we care for the weak and vulnerable. That is the real problem in Ontario."

In 2000, he said, there is no reason why people should sleep in the streets and have meals in churches and synagogues.

'It is not a party issue'

"We do not say that every rich person must have somehow cheated, so by the same token, we cannot say that every homeless person has done something wrong. We should not blame the victim for his condition, but we have developed a climate in Ontario that points in that direction."

He is frustrated he said, because Harris implies that something is being done to address the problem. "The statistics with which the government seeks to deflate our anxieties dazzle and daze us. But what your staff argues in the abstract doesn't correspond to what we know from real life," Rabbi Marmur wrote in the letter.

"All we know is what we encounter," he said. "We can only guess that about one-third of the homeless need a protective institution, which is not available.

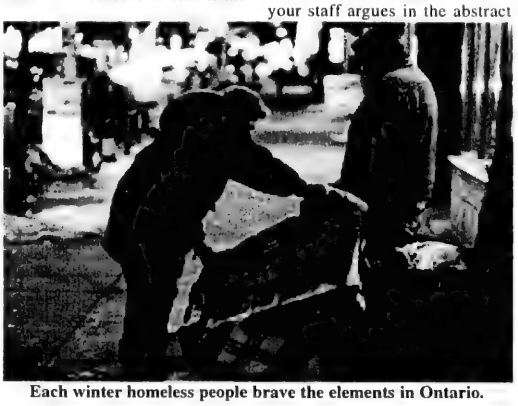
"Then there are others who have to choose between paying rent or eating. We get a lot of people [at Out of the Cold] who do have somewhere to live, but then have nothing left after they pay rent, and it is not only a Toronto problem. It is moving into 905 as well."

About five years ago, Holy Blossom built Plaut Manor, a 97-suite affordable housing unit for people of all ages. "Volunteer organizations, however, cannot carry the burden indefinitely. I hear from all sorts of agencies that what we are all offering is a band-aid solution to a comprehensive problem.

"It is not difficult for the province to take steps to make sure there is more affordable housing for those who need it. If people would not have to pay so much for rent, they could afford to eat. We also need institutions for those who cannot care for themselves. The notion that people prefer to be homeless, is nonsense."

The last time he approached Harris, Rabbi Marmur said, Harris suggested he write the minister of housing, but he did not get an acknowledgement. "I'm writing this, [therefore], as an open letter. Even if those in power ignore it, it may move others to speak.

"All that is left is to make noise, alert people, and proclaim outrage," Rabbi Marmur said.



Each winter homeless people brave the elements in Ontario.

Zareinu student prepares for his bar mitzvah

Jeremiah Shell is physically challenged, unable to speak

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jeremiah Shell is a handsome, 12-year-old Jewish boy. Like most Jewish boys his age, he and his parents are planning his bar mitzvah.

For Jeremiah, however, there is a difference. A student at Zareinu since the school's inception 11 years ago, Jeremiah is both physically challenged and unable to speak.

Goldman told The CJN in an interview at the school's new quarters in the Sephardic Kehilla Centre that each Jewish child should have the opportunity to be a part of the Jewish community as much as they are able.

"We want Jeremiah to feel inclusion. We feel that it is as important to him as it is to any other Jewish kid."

Jeremiah communicates partly by signs, and partly through a modified communication board called an augmentative communication device.

Goldman explained that this is a "high-tech [system] that uses words, pictures and voice output devices," and can be adapted to suit the individual situation.

Plans are to create a special board to teach him aspects of a synagogue service and Jewish practice.

Communications disorder assistant, Becky Handley, said that she also plans to make up booklets for the guests at the bar mitzvah showing the symbols Jeremiah will be using.

"We will be looking for ways to insert [the bar mitzvah] into his curriculum," she said.

In the meantime, Jeremiah will be encouraged to take on mitzvot to prepare for the bar mitzvah. The first one, which he has just finished, was the collection of non-perishable food to be given to Tomchei Shabbos, an organization that gives food baskets to the Jewish poor on Shabbat.

Flyers were distributed (with Jeremiah's name on it) asking for contributions to Jeremiah's Food Drive, and he helped receive the food, and pack it for distribution. A graph charted what came in – some 89 items of food.

Vancouver Hillel Film Festival planned

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of the goals of the first-ever Vancouver Hillel Film Festival is to reach groups who are not active in Hillel, according to Lori Braha, program director of the Vancouver B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation.

On Campus

The first night of the festival, Sunday, Jan. 9, will feature Onions and Garlic, an animated film about an old Hebrew fable, and Remember Assaf, a film in which friends and family recall the life of Assaf Sibony, a young soldier killed in a helicopter accident.

Lori Braha and Eadie Meyer, who co-ordinated the festival, hope the first night will interest Israeli students and the young people who will be participating in the Birthright Israel trip, for whom this event will be a pre-program.

While Brahya and Meyer have made an effort to cater to the interests of specific groups each evening, everybody is welcome to all the films, they said.

On Monday night, Braha and Meyer hope to attract the gay and lesbian population. The night, co-sponsored by Pride UBC, will feature a short movie called When Shirley Met Florence, described in one of the festival's flyers as "an intimate portrait of two women in their mid-60s – one lesbian, the other heterosexual – whose love for one another and the music they create together, transcends differences."

The second movie, Bubbeh Lee & Me is a funny portrait about a Jewish grandmother and her grandson. A festival flyer says of the movie: "Whether taking daily excursions to the grocery store to return under-ripe produce or sharing hard-won wisdom over blintzes on Rosh Hashanah, Lee Abrahams is a woman who lives on her own terms. For her filmmaker grandson, a young gay man born to a Jewish mother and a Protestant father, 87-year-old Bubbeh Lee is a vital link to self and cultural identity... As the two of them relate feelings of love lost or hidden, kibitz about strategies for shopping and avoid meddling matchmakers, the strength of their bond emerges."

Tuesday night's films target primarily graduate students and young professionals, with The Party Favour and Me & My Matchmaker.

In the first movie, "a young lesbian couple attends a sister's wedding shower in search of a gift of their own. They find it in the unexpected package of Friends star David Schwimmer," says a festival flyer. The movie has won several awards, including the Jury Award at the U.S.A. Film Festival in Dallas and Best Women's Short in the Cleveland International Film Festival.

Me & My Matchmaker is about a single, half-Jewish filmmaker who attempts to make a documentary about a Jewish matchmaker in Chicago. The matchmaker tries to convert him and set him up with some of her clients. As the film progresses, the two grow closer.

On Wednesday, films will be shown at Simon Fraser University. Braha and Meyer hope to attract people interested in gender issues.

The first movie, Bambinger, is based on a short story by Mordecai Richler set in Montreal during the World War II. The film is about a family who takes in a Jewish refugee named Mr. Bambinger. Sammy, the 12-year-old son, resents Mr. Bambinger's entrance into the family, but his resentment melts into compassion when he discovers that the ship carrying the refugee's wife and son to Canada has been struck by a torpedo.

The second movie, The Return of Sarah's Daughters, is a personal documentary about secular women drawn to Orthodoxy.

While the Vancouver B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation has held poetry readings and other arts-related programs, it has never held a film festival, said Eadie Meyer, the foundation's cultural chair and festival co-ordinator.

At the beginning of October, Brahya and Meyer began looking for films for the festival and finalized the selection a few weeks ago.

The movies are "a little bit of an eclectic selection, but hopefully they will appeal to a lot of people," said Meyer.

Tickets are $3 per evening. Festival passes for viewing all the movies are available for $8. Call 604-224-4748.

Scouting awards presented

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — For many people here, Howard Osterer and the 39th Ottawa Henry "Hank" Torontow Scouting Movement are one and the same.

The 1999 Elaine Rabin Social Service Award was presented jointly to Osterer and the scouting organization that is, according to Dan Greenberg who presented the award, "the last remaining Jewish scouting movement in Canada."

The award is given annually to a member of the community who has demonstrated a major contribution to social services. The presentation was made at the 19th annual general meeting of Jewish Family Services of Ottawa-Carleton.

When told that he had been chosen for the award, Osterer insisted that "the 39th" be included.

"It isn't often that one gets the chance to honour both an individual and an institution at the same time," Greenberg said in presenting the award.

"The 39th Ottawa has been a vital part of the Ottawa community for 84 years," he said.

Osterer's community involvement is widespread. "Howie is everywhere," said Greenberg. "As a friend, it is hard to enumerate all his contributions to the community. Howie is the recognized leader of Jewish scouting in Ottawa. [He is also] the youngest member of the chevra kadisha. In 1992, he was awarded the Young Leadership Award. He is so busy that his parents and his wife are here tonight just to get a glimpse of him!"

In accepting the award, Osterer recognized the example set by his parents, Blanche and Joe, who are both still active in the local Jewish community. He spoke of his love of scouting and his good fortune to work, professionally, for Scouts Canada as well.

He outlined the history of the 39th Ottawa Henry "Hank" Torontow Scouting Movement, reminiscing about his first cub master, the late Hank Torontow, who, he said, instilled in him the love of scouting.

Describing some of the good works done by the troop, Osterer cited such examples as collecting and distributing food for the food bank, visiting the elderly and helping at holiday celebrations.

"We are all volunteers," he said. "We do it for the love of scouting. We believe we can keep Shabbat, keep kosher and still have an active scouting program."

At one time, there were nearly 25 Jewish scout troops in Toronto, Osterer said. Now there are none. The 39th Ottawa Henry "Hank" Torontow Scouting Movement stands alone in the country as the sole remaining Jewish scout troop.

Quebec press council rejects complaint against La Presse

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Quebec Press Council has rejected a Jewish community complaint against La Presse journalist Jooneed Khan, who used the word "juiverie" in an opinion piece last February.

The term is considered highly derogatory by the Jewish community.

"We were disappointed with the decision," said Dorothy Zalcman Howard, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Quebec region.

"I think we demonstrated quite clearly that the use of the term was pejorative."

In an article published Feb. 3, titled "War of Prayers," Khan used the word juiverie twice, triggering a flurry of letters to the late Claude Masson, then the newspaper's assistant publisher, from CJC-Q, as well as the Quebec branch of the Canada-Israel Committee and the Israeli consulate.

Virtually all contemporary dictionaries characterize the word as pejorative, although it is also defined as an archaic term for the Jewish community that ceased to be used in that way after the 19th century.

In its decision, the council recognized that Khan's use of the term, even if "technically accurate [in its archaic sense]...could effectively convey a different and pejorative meaning" to the Jewish community.

But it also said the community had the right to reply to Khan in La Presse and that Khan subsequently apologized in the newspaper through a clarification in which he recognized that there were, "those individuals for whom the unconsidered usage [of juiverie] could be hurtful."

Legitimate opinion

The council decided that Khan's clarification provided sufficient even-handedness.

The council also rejected another aspect of the complaint, which alleged that Khan's writing vis-à-vis Israel and the Jews has been tendentious and has potentially pandered to anti-Semitic stereotypes.

In the article in question, for example, Khan wrote that American Jewish influence in the Israeli elections in May, "is evidenced by the money U.S. Jews [la juiverie] inject into the Israeli campaigns."

The council said that in the context of Khan's piece, the views that were expressed fell within the bounds of legitimate opinions expressed in media coverage.

Therefore, according to the council, Khan's article did not show any, "significant disparities with the usual [journalistic] norms allowed in the profession in Quebec."

In Zalcman Howard's view, the council, by failing to reprimand Khan for his use of juiverie, "missed an opportunity to put forward a decision that would be clear and unequivocal, and unfortunately chose to avoid dealing with the issue in a strong fashion."

She said that even though the council said the Jewish community had been "free to respond," it had indeed done so in a timely manner through a number of letters.

However, Zalcman Howard said CJC-Q would not appeal the case because, "there would be nothing to be gained.

"We feel we made a very good submission. It was very well-researched. We'll remain vigilant, of course."

Asper Foundation expands Holocaust studies program

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Asper Foundation has launched the second phase in its Holocaust Studies Program, which sponsors trips for middle school students to the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

For the past two years, the foundation has sponsored a trip to the Holocaust museum for all Grade 8 students attending the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education's Simkin Middle School, as part of the program aimed at educating students about the dangers of intolerance and racism.

Now Israel Asper has opened up the program to all Jewish Grade 9 students in Winnipeg. (Previous participants are not eligible.)

On Dec. 13, the Asper Foundation, in collaboration with the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada and the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, held an information evening for Jewish Grade 9 students and their parents, to discuss the Washington trip. About 100 people attended, says project co-ordinator Shelley Faintuch.

"We had a very enthusiastic response," she says. "A number of parents said that this is a wonderful gift that we are offering."

Gary Jacobson had some questions going into the session but reports that they were answered to his satisfaction.

"This is a wonderful opportunity for our children to relate to the history of the Holocaust and learn about the past," he says.

Jacobson, whose son, Noah, is looking forward to going with his friends, is impressed with the educational preparation for the visit and says he is pleased with the 16 hours of community work that trip participants have to commit to. There is also a $200 participation fee.

The application deadline is Jan. 21, Faintuch says.

Applicants have to submit a 250 to 300-word essay on what they hope to get out of the trip. The students will also be interviewed as part of the application process. The trip is slated for next June.

Faintuch adds that eventually the Asper Foundation plans to open the trip up to non-Jewish students as well.

In a press release, Israel Asper writes: "I am deeply committed to the teaching of the history of the Holocaust, its abuse of human rights and why we need to ensure that it will never happen again. Not only, may I add, to the Jewish people, but to all peoples threatened and persecuted because of their race, religion, ethnic background, gender or age. I consider it very important that we tell our sons and daughters this story of degradation, denial, humiliation, hatred and, ultimately, genocide."

Holocaust survivors honoured

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Max and Rena Fronenberg never imagined that decades after surviving the Holocaust, they would go to a New York hotel to receive an award from Elie Wiesel.

The Fronenbergs, who live in Montreal, were among a group of survivors awarded the Elie Wiesel Remembrance Medal for having survived the Holocaust and for their long-standing support for State of Israel Bonds.

"When I was chosen, I was very reluctant," said Rena, who was joined by her spouse during a recent interview. "I felt that this award belongs to everybody [who survived]."

Max said he felt much the same way. "When I was presented with the medal, I saw all of my past. We got up from the ashes. It's been a great honour for us to achieve what we have achieved."

Born in Warsaw, Max was only 21 and living in the Warsaw Ghetto when he was transported to Paviak Prison as a labourer, just before the Warsaw Ghetto was liquidated.

Working in the prison's carpentry shop, he and two other inmates built a tunnel into the sewer and enabled 17 prisoners to escape.

Max had three other siblings, but only he and his father, Baruch, survived the war; more than 100 other relatives also perished. His father died in Montreal in 1979.

Rena, who was born about 100 kilometres away from Warsaw in Radom, first met Max, when she was a prisoner in Paviak.

Her maiden name was Rosenbaum, but she acquired "gentile papers" and lived the war under constant fear of discovery.

"Every day," she said, "I thought would be my last."

Interned in Paviak for possessing a false registration card, but still thought to be gentile, Rena, who was held in the women's side, would see Max staring at her from the workshop window, she said. She eventually disclosed her Jewish identity to Max, she said.

Max, in fact, used connections in the prison office to keep Rena from undergoing interrogation – her papers kept going to the bottom of the pile, he said.

Rena was evacuated with the other female inmates to the Rubensbrig concentration camp, where she worked in a munitions factory until she was liberated by the Russians in May 1945.

"I thought I was the last Jew left alive," she said.

Returning home, but still in her prisoner's uniform, Rena, by sheer luck, saw a friend of Max's at the Lodz train station and told him to let Max know she had survived. Her father and sisters also survived the war.

Max and Rena went on to live their own lives, but eventually found each other and kept in touch.

Rena married Sam Gutstadt in Poland. They eventually moved to Toronto and had two children, Eli and Evette. Sam Gutstadt died in 1979.

Max married Helina Brandes and also had two children, Louis and Iris. Helina Brandes died in 1987, and Max married Rena a year later.

Both said they saw their recent awards as a symbol of their survival, especially since the recognition came from one of Israel's most important organizations.

"With Israel, I feel saved," Rena said. "Without Israel we wouldn't be able to lift our heads, but with Israel strong, we can lift our heads up high. Israel represents us."

Financial troubles force Sephardi school to close

This article appeared in French in the Montreal edition of The CJN, Sept. 16. The translation is being printed at the request of some of our readers.

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The directors of Collège Hillel have been trying to improve their school's image for several years. But a chaotic financial situation and an unsuccessful campaign to recruit new students finally forced the Sephardi school to close.

The decision was announced about two weeks before the start of the new school year.

"I certainly did not expect Collège Hillel to close its doors this year," Charles Benisty, former president of Collège Hillel, told The CJN. "Unfortunately, the financial difficulties the school was facing didn't give us much room to manoeuvre. But we want to reassure the parents of the approximately 130 students in our primary and secondary classes that the leadership of the Montreal Jewish community has taken all the steps necessary to have these students welcomed at and integrated into other Jewish schools in the city."

The school's closing, he added, is a high priority item that has mobilized community leaders involved with Jewish education in Montreal.

"Working very closely together, FEDERATION CJA, the Communauté Sépharade du Québec (CSQ) and other groups decided to get going and invest the financial resources necessary to enable the transition to take place smoothly," Benisty said.

Most of the 130 students will continue their studies at the two campuses – in Côte St. Luc and Ville Saint-Laurent – of École Maïmonide.

Benisty said francophone Sephardi education is experiencing a major crisis, which, in the long run, places the future of francophone Sephardi schools in Montreal at great risk. One obvious symptom of the crisis, he said, is "the disturbing decrease" in the number of Sephardi children being educated in Montreal's Sephardi schools.

Major crisis

"This recurring crisis is weakening the Sephardi education system," he said. "It is time to face this serious problem with clarity and determination. We will not succeed in mitigating a crisis of this nature with pompous words and hollow promises. We must take concrete action. We have to recognize that more and more francophone Sephardi students are attending primary and secondary schools in the French immersion programs of the anglophone Jewish schools. About 20 years ago, most Sephardi children attended Sephardi schools. That is no longer the case.

"These families refuse to have anything to do with Sephardi education. You get the impression that being Sephardi is no longer important to them. You can't help deploring this frantic cultural assimilation," he said, somewhat bitterly.

Sephardi schools in Montreal have great difficulty in recruiting new students, Benisty said.

"These schools must now compete with anglophone schools that have modern, attractive infrastructures. These schools have a much more solid financial base than do the Sephardi schools.

"For a long time, we have forgotten that we live on a continent, North America, where marketing is king. It's time to 'sell' our high quality educational 'products' to Sephardi parents."

The CSQ recently established a working committee made up of education experts whose principal mandate will be to propose solutions to deal with the problem.

"I hope the committee will succeed in formulating some plausible, viable recommendations," Benisty said. "We have sat on our laurels for too long. It is time to wake up and take notice once and for all of the nature and the extent of this problem. The future of Sephardi education is at stake.

"It is essential to open a real and ongoing debate on the question among the authorities responsible for Jewish education in Montreal."

Winnipeg high school graduating class fares well academically

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Last year's graduating class at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate was the largest in the Winnipeg Jewish school's history.

Not only was it a large class, but judging by the number of scholarships awarded the students by Winnipeg's two universities, the students were also a gifted group academically.

Of the 45 graduates, 25 were offered scholarships by one or both of the University of Winnipeg and the University of Manitoba.

From the latter institution, graduates Laura Kravetsky, Hart Schwartz and Paul Yaffe were awarded the largest sums in the form of Advanced Early Admission Scholarships for having averages of over 90 percent. Yaffe also earned the Chown Centennial Entrance Scholarship.

U of M Entrance Scholarships for high standing were also awarded to Lindsay Gilfix, Amy Greenfeld, Breean Rusen, Tamara Simon and Jennifer Sawyer. Benjamin Goldenberg and Aviva Shwaid received Hogg Centennial Entrance Scholarships.

Eighteen of the graduates, including some of those who chose to accept the U of M scholarships, were offered special entrance scholarships by the U of W. In addition to last year's graduates, scholarship awards were announced for five earlier JWC grads currently attending the U of W.

Daniel Thau-Eleff, Brian Goldstein, Anna Tennenhouse and Steven Selchen were winners of the Academic Proficiency Scholarships. Selchen, whose brother is a Rhodes Scholar, also received the prestigious H.V. Rutherford Scholarship and the Dr. Charles Code Scholarship in Biology. Tennenhouse was also presented with the Frederick and Edith (Robertson) Baragar Scholarship while Goldstein was recognized with the Chemistry Faculty Scholarship. Marcie Dudeck received the Dr. C.J. Robson Scholarship in Psychology.

Analysis Israel remains isolated at the UN

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak likes to boast about Israel's new-found popularity in the international community, suggesting that it stems from his rise to power.

This may be so, but if Israel in the Barak era is newly popular around the world, the United Nations doesn't show it. Israel remains isolated inside New York's glass building, where it faces a crushing majority mobilized by the PLO and Egypt, plus other Arab states.

The 54th annual session of the UN General Assembly ended last month. The record of its resolutions pertaining to Israel shows that the international community is stingy about giving the Barak government the benefit of the doubt by changing the traditional pattern of adopting anti-Israel resolutions.

In 1999 the General Assembly passed 21 resolutions unfavourable to Israel, relating to issues such as Palestinian self-determination, land for peace, the demand that Israel sign the nuclear arms non-proliferation treaty, and the non-recognition of the annexation of Jerusalem and the Golan.

On many votes, Israel's position was backed by a minuscule minority comprised of the United States and the Marshall Islands, the Pacific chain of islands that has replaced Micronesia as Israel's sole staunch ally, apart from the Americans.

When it comes to the sensitive issue of Jerusalem, Israel stands alone, in opposition to the entire international community. On Jerusalem, the United States abstained from casting a ballot. On Golan votes, Israel's UN ambassador notched a slight victory, managing to persuade the Europeans to abstain, contending that the line referring to June 4, 1967 in the relevant resolution has no legal validity in establishing an ultimate border.

Not surprisingly, the Foreign Ministry records this as a bad year at the UN. Israel wilted as the PLO and Egypt continued their diplomatic assault. Israel's bid to use to its advantage both the change of government here and the renewal of the peace process on two tracks – and thereby reverse traditional patterns of voting at the UN – registered as a resounding failure.

Many UN diplomats lauded the Sharm agreement and the new, positive winds that currently blow in the Middle East; and UN Secretary General Kofi Annan even sponsored efforts to improve Israel's status in the organization. But such pleasant words and overtures proved hollow the moment ballots were counted.

Israel endeavoured to resuscitate a "positive resolution," originally passed by the UN after the Oslo accord, that expresses support for the peace process. This attempt floundered when the Palestinians and the Egyptians added phrases not entirely acceptable to Israel, such as "land for peace." In the end, Israel gave up on the resolution, despite efforts by its sponsors, the United States, Russia and Norway, to persuade Israel to go along.

The UN battle features two contradictory views, that of Israel and that of the Palestinian Authority. Israel maintains that it is wrong to use double standards – having peace negotiations around a discussion table while her peace partners launch a stinging diplomatic attack against her in international forums.

The positive changes in the general atmosphere should be reflected at the UN and other international venues, says Israel. To this end, Foreign Minister David Levy reiterates Israel's demand that the Palestinians uphold a "behavioural code," and stop sending a double message.

The Palestinians, of course, see things differently. Backed firmly by Egypt, their delegates contend that Israel is holding all the cards at the negotiating table, and that she has the wherewithal to dictate to the PA any solution she favours.

As the weaker side, the Palestinians claim that they hold only one type of leverage – the support of the international community. It is pressure from the international community that compels Israel to compromise, the Palestinians say. For this reason, as long as a final status agreement has not been forged, the Palestinians will do their utmost to preserve the UN's traditional voting patterns.

Despite the evident diplomatic setbacks, officials at the Foreign Ministry refer to a few accomplishments at the UN this year. Some 10 to 15 countries, a greater number than in the past, chose to leave the auditorium whenever the assembly discussed Israel and the Middle East. An encouraging signal was the choice of Mauritania, which established diplomatic ties with Israel this year, to abstain from some votes.

Officials in Jerusalem are now preparing for the next millennium's first UN General Assembly sessions. They are divided about tactics for the coming year. One group favours both abandoning the policy of dismissing the UN's resolutions as lacking substance, and also taking a firm stand with the Palestinians by demanding that they stop their diplomatic assaults.

On the other hand, prime ministers in Israel have not taken this position vis-a-vis the UN, preferring instead to differentiate between the international community's positions (which they ignored), and direct negotiations.

Should Israel indeed decide to change this policy and invest a larger effort in the diplomatic UN battle, she needs to start spreading the message now in world capitals, telling other governments, "We've had enough."

Meantime, as far as the Palestinians are concerned, they can draw a happy face next to the record of this year's resolutions adopted by the General Assembly.

Hezbollah willing to trade info

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hezbollah will reveal information about Israeli air force navigator Ron Arad in return for the release of five Lebanese prisoners by Israel last week.

Arad has been missing since 1986 when his plane crashed over Lebanon due to a technical mishap.

The sources in Israel and Europe added, however, that the information in question will not indicate precisely where Arad is today.

The details have not yet been conveyed to Israel and are due to be communicated through German mediation. Defence sources said that it will take some time before the credibility of the information to be passed on by Hezbollah can be evaluated.

Apparently the piece of information relates to the period during which Arad was held by the organization of Mustafa Dirani, about 10 years ago.

Dirani was abducted from Lebanon by Israel and is still being held as a bargaining chip in order to obtain more information about Arad.

It is unclear whether Hezbollah knows what happened to Arad, or has any interest in reporting what happened to him after he was transferred to the Iranian Revolutionary Guards even if it does know.

Israeli diplomatic sources are reported as saying that Israel took a positive view of the approach shown by Hezbollah over the past few days.

Striking a more cautionary note though, Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh said last week in an interview that it would be wrong to begin "celebrating" in the wake of Hezbollah's statement that it was ready to collect information about Ron Arad.

Commentators in Lebanon have noted recently that underlying the German mediation efforts between Israel and Hezbollah is Berlin's desire to improve its tense relations with Iran.

German-Iranian relations have been strained since early 1997, when Germany accused Iran's spiritual leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and former president Hashemi Rafsanjani of responsibility for the murder of Kurdish exiles in Berlin.

Germany has acted as an intermediary between Israel and various Lebanese organizations on a number of occasions in the past.

A western diplomat in Beirut said last week that "it is important for the Germans not to extend the break with Iran, because too much money is at stake for that. It is not in the Germans' interest to be tough when others are talking about a constructive dialogue with Iran."

A Hezbollah official who was interviewed in the paper, Al Hayat said that "there was no deal," but added that "Berlin was promised by the Hezbollah leadership that it would get information about Ron Arad because the organization wants to resolve the question of the Lebanese prisoners" in Israel.

He said that a German delegation came to Beirut with an Israeli proposal to release five of the 21 Lebanese prisoners then being held, in the hope that this would induce the Lebanese side to reveal what happened to Arad.

Military report confident of peace with Syria

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli-Syrian peace process, which was to resume this week near Washington, has taken an unprecedented path.

Both sides are projecting a serious approach and a determination to meet each other halfway, based on a preferred option of peace, according to a report from the research division of the IDF's military intelligence branch.

The resolve manifested by the three leaders involved – U.S. President Bill Clinton, Syrian President Hafez al-Assad and Prime Minister Ehud Barak – is a crucial contributing factor, the report states.

It goes on to note that the two countries have never been closer to a strategic decision that could lead to peace – and that the new state of affairs is the result of a radically different shift in Assad's views that has made him a great believer in the United States and in Clinton.

The report's conclusions, which form the cornerstone of the appraisal by military intelligence (MI), is one of the foundations of the peace initiative undertaken by Barak.

According to the research division of MI, headed by Brig.-Gen. Amos Gilad, the window of opportunity that is now open, is due in part, to the failure of Iran's plan to export the "Islamic revolution."

MI also attaches great importance to the parliament elections to be held there in February, and will be watching to see what impact the elections will have on undercurrents in Iran that could destabilize the rule of the nation's clerics, led by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

At the same time, MI warns that Iran will try to drown the Israeli-Syrian peace process in a sea of blood by stepping up actions by terrorist organizations under its control.

MI maintains, however, that an Israeli-Syrian peace treaty will ultimately reduce terrorism coming from Lebanon. Israel would be surrounded by states with which it maintains peaceful relations, and the buffer zone between it and Iran would be bolstered. Iran, in contrast, would be isolated and surrounded by hostile states.

According to MI, the fundamental difference between all previous rounds of the Israeli-Syrian peace talks and the present negotiations, is the change that has taken place in Assad's approach. Two elements comprise that change: the status of Israel and the status of Syria.

Israel is not threatened by an Arab coalition any longer and enjoys peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan. Moreover, the image of the IDF in the Arab world is that of a powerful army that can crush enemy armies separately or together.

Syria, in contrast, is isolated, and does not have a strategic neighbour in the form of Iraq, while its strategic ties with Iran do not rest on territorial continuity.

MI says that it was only during the past year that Assad finally internalized the meaning of the collapse of the communist world.

Assad, of course, knew all about the collapse of the communist regime in the Soviet Union and its ripple effect. But he found it difficult to cope with that knowledge and to assimilate it into his thinking.

One reason for the change, was a gradual rapprochement between Damascus and Washington, bolstered by constant visits by top administration officials to the Syrian capital. The result was that Assad developed a high level of trust in the United States, and more specifically in Clinton.

Assad, according to the MI assessment, regards Clinton as the source of his hopes.

This new-found confidence in the United States is overlaid by Assad's feeling that he is approaching his twilight years and wishes to leave his son, Bashar, a stable nation with the Golan intact.

MI likens Assad to the Roman god Janus, the guardian of gates and doors, who is traditionally represented with two heads set back-to-back. One head looks to the future, the other to the past. Assad, according to MI, is looking toward the future.

MI's overall conclusion is that peace with Syria will constitute a revolutionary change in the region, weakening ties between Syria and Iran and stabilizing Lebanon. On the other hand, MI believes that peace will strengthen ties between Syria and Jordan, and forge a circle of peace around Israel that creates a buffer zone between Israel and enemies such as Iran and Iraq.

Popes begin sainthood process

The recognition of John's "heroic virtues" was the first step toward his beatification. It must now be followed by a decree recognizing a miracle.

John XXIII, who followed Pius XII and reigned from 1958-1963, was one of the most revered and beloved popes – by Jews as well as Catholics. In 1962, he called the Second Vatican Council, which revolutionized the Catholic Church.

Among the innovations of the Council was the 1965 Nostra Aetate decree, which repudiated the Catholic teaching that the Jews were collectively responsible for Jesus' death and opened the way to Catholic-Jewish dialogue.

Jewish leaders have also praised John because of his efforts to save Jews during World War II when he was apostolic delegate to Turkey.

Pius IX reigned from 1846 to 1878 and in many ways was John's opposite. For Jews, his beatification is, like that of Pius XII, problematic.

But Jewish groups that oppose the beatification of Pius XII are less concerned about Pius IX.

"We do not pass judgment unless it is someone who objects or distorts Jewish history," said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress.

Steinberg said Jews oppose Pius XII's beatification because he "distorted the truth" about what happened to the Jews during the Holocaust.

"Besides this exception, it is not for the Jewish people to decide who the Catholic Church should make saint," Steinberg said.

In the current issue of Shalom, the magazine of the Rome Jewish Community, author Daniele Scalise describes Pius IX as "anti-Semitic and violent.

"His policy toward Roman Jews was that of trickery, arrogance and cruelty," he wrote.

Deeply conservative, Pius IX rejected papal reconciliation with progress, liberalism and modern civilization, and championed the concept of papal infallibility.

The last pope to wield temporal power, he saw the vast Papal States of central Italy wrested from papal control during Italy's unification process, beginning in 1848. The unification brought full equality to Jews in Italy, and many Jews were prominent in the movement.

Rome, the last stronghold of papal power, finally fell to Italian freedom fighters in 1870. Until then, Pius IX kept Roman Jews confined to the ghetto, in wretched conditions and under severe restrictions.

The most notorious single anti-Semitic event during Pius IX's reign, however, occurred in Bologna – the kidnapping in 1858 of 7-year-old Edgardo Mortara after a servant told a priest that she had secretly baptized the boy when he was a baby.

At that time, Bologna was under papal jurisdiction, and papal guards, saying they were acting on the pope's orders, seized the boy from his Jewish family and brought him to Rome to be brought up as a Catholic.

The incident sparked a public outcry and a wave of international protests. Emperors Franz Joseph of Austria and Napoleon III of France urged the pope to give up the child, but he remained adamant. Mortara eventually became a priest and died in 1940.

"It was a fearful crime against humanity," wrote Scalise, who authored a book on the Mortara affair. "Mortara remained a hostage of the Catholic Church until the end of his life."

Talks a turning point

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The sudden resumption of talks between Israel and Syria after a hiatus of almost four years probably marks a turning point in the annals of the Mideast.

Mideast Analysis

Both sides, more so than in the past, are intent on signing a peace treaty and putting the Arab-Israeli dispute behind them. At last month's White House ceremony, the Syrian foreign minister, Farouk al-Sharaa, the highest-ranking Syrian official to meet an Israeli leader, delivered a combative speech and kept his distance from Prime Minister Ehud Barak. Sharaa, however, said that Syria seeks a just and honourable peace and that the attainment of peace is a "strategic option" for Syria.

If Israel comes to terms with Syria, its bitterest rival and the avatar of Arab nationalism, the way will be cleared for a regional settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Although Hafez al-Assad frittered away two golden opportunities to wrest control of the Golan Heights in negotiations with Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres, he most likely will not make the same mistake again. Sharaa alluded to this when he observed that Israel and Syria are poised on "the threshold of a historic opportunity."

By all accounts, Barak is offering Assad a virtually total pullout from the Golan based on the 1923 international border rather than on the June 4, 1967 line. Territorially speaking, the difference between these lines is minor. But for Israel, a withdrawal of this magnitude is an astonishing but unavoidable concession, the significance of which Syria understands. Should Assad accept the offer, which Barak has yet to spell out publicly, Syria will regain the Golan, save for the northeastern tip of the Sea of Galilee which it controlled before the Six Day War. If Assad holds out for more land, which is not inconceivable, Israel and Syria will, in all probability, split the difference.

Syria chose to resume negotiations now, after eight years of on-again-off-again discussions, for a variety of reasons.

• Syria has fought a proxy war against Israel through Hezbollah in southern Lebanon as a means by which to exert pressure on the Israeli government to retreat from the Golan. Turning the tables on Assad, Barak spoke of a unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon and thereby deprived Assad of his trump card.

• The United States, the chief power broker in the Middle East, rejected a Syrian interpretation that Rabin had, in fact, promised to withdraw to the June 4 line in exchange for appropriate concessions. Washington's position isolated Damascus and prompted an urgent re-evaluation.

• Assad wants an agreement before President Bill Clinton – an ardent supporter of the peace process – leaves office. The incentives would be twofold: removal of Syria from the U.S. State Department's list of terrorist states and Syrian eligibility for American, European and Japanese economic and military aid.

• Assad is ailing and is increasingly concerned about the question of succession. He wishes to wipe the slate clean of the Golan before his son and heir-apparent, Bashar, mounts the stage.

More broadly, Assad's interest in reaching a peace accord with Israel – a country he doubtless detests – is predicated on a measure of military weakness. With the dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1991, he lost an important ally and arms supplier. Even before then, Moscow had informed Assad that his goal of attaining "strategic parity" with Israel was a pipe dream.

Due to these factors, Assad was forced to abandon one of his cardinal policies – a prior commitment from Barak to return to the June 4 line – when he entered into talks with Israel in mid-December. Barak, nevertheless, has acknowledged that an agreement without a massive Israeli withdrawal is simply inconceivable.

Besides, a precedent has already been set. On the eve of his 1977 visit to Jerusalem, Israel assured Anwar Sadat that Egypt would regain sovereignty of the Sinai after a peace treaty. Assad, one imagines, has received a similar assurance from Barak. Talks would not have resumed under any other condition.

Fridge Magnets stick to smart lyrics and catchy tunes

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The last song on the Fridge Magnets' debut CD is about devouring treats like Haagan Dazs ice cream and relishing the purchase of snacks from vending machines.

But the Fridge Magnets, a singing, song-writing, guitar-playing duo find inspiration in more than just food.

Ricko Levine, a Fridge Magnet, explained during a recent performance that his six-month-old daughter had inspired him to write the song Looking Up At Me, the fourth song on their CD.

"Little kids have this propensity to look up at you with this longing in their eyes, as if to say, 'You are my world,'" Levine said.

Earlier in the show, Levine described his motivation for writing the song Another Season: "There was a time a little while ago when a lot of people I know were breaking up, so this song is about reasons to stay together."

Levine explained the source of their wacky name. Think of all the stuff you stick under fridge magnets, he said. Your daughter's math tests, your son's fridge art, schedules and wedding invitations.

"That's the kind of thing we sing about – love, [family] and relationships," he said in an interview after the show.

In the summer of 1998, Ricko Levine, a Bronx native, and Mark Freedman, a Toronto native, began playing together in Toronto's Earl Bales Park, after being introduced by a mutual friend.

By November of that year, they had begun recording their first CD, Bootleg, and a month later they performed their first gig as the Fridge Magnets. Since then, they have played in bookstores and clubs across the Greater Toronto Area.

The songs on their first CD are a simple combination of guitar sound and male vocals, with little of the jazzy production add-ons typical of high profile bands.

The tunes have a mellow, earthy, natural sound that will make you feel as if Levine and Freedman are performing live in your living room.

"We wanted a very clear, natural sound," said Freedman in a phone interview. So they purposely avoided overdubbing (adding in vocals or instruments after a song has already been recorded).

The Fridge Magnets' songs are typically a blend of folk, pop, jazz and blues, Freedman said.

Levine has noticed that this folk rock-type music is in demand.

"There's a whole generation of people out there that don't have anything new to listen to – my generation," said Levine, 36.

"They can't relate to Alanis Morissette or Jewel. The folk rock music seems to be relegated to women who are singing about pain or angst."

According to Levine, one fan bought a CD at a Fridge Magnet performance and later told him: "This is the type of music I love to listen to. I can't get it anywhere else."

The duo has been told that their music is reminiscent of Paul Simon, but Levine said they do not aim to copy other artists.

"We're not about inventing or reinventing the wheel. We're about being true to a style of music that began in the late '60s and early '70s. It's like The Eagles, Joni Mitchell, Crosby, Stills & Nash. It's smart lyrics and catchy melodies," he said.

So far, the Fridge Magnets have sold about 1,000 copies of their CD and hope to release a new one by next summer that will have a fuller production sound, including a rhythm section with drums, keyboard and saxophone, Levine and Freedman said.

"We're really going to surprise people with a fuller scope of the type of music we play," said Levine.

The Fridge Magnets will be performing this month at Chapters bookstores and Indigo Books Music & Cafe locations across the Greater Toronto Area. For more information, check www.tourdates.com.

Actor Waxman reveals exactly what he is

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Once upon a time, a young aspiring Canadian actor named Al Waxman was invited to a private performance of the play A View from the Bridge, by Arthur Miller, which was staged primarily for the playwright in New York.

As Waxman relates in his recent autobiography That's What I Am, (Malcolm Lester Books, $32.95.) he sat behind Miller and watched his reactions keenly as the drama unfolded.

"He was shaking his head slowly from side to side in awe and appreciation of the work before his eyes, and quietly but audibly saying over and over, 'Amazing,'" Waxman writes.

"This was a source of satisfaction and reassurance, because it always bothered me in a way that actors, as artists, were not creators but interpreters, or at best secondary creators; the writers were primary, the creators.

"Yet here was one of the great writers of our time, amazed by new aspects of a work he had originally created as they were revealed to him by the actors."

In a similar way, Waxman's book comes as a stirring revelation. The Toronto-based actor-director of television, screen and stage reveals himself as a natural raconteur with a ripe story to tell, one that is always earnest, and by turns informative, humorous and wise.

One of the biggest revelations, perhaps, is that Waxman, whose name has always seemed to appear near the top of the list of dramatic talent produced in this country, has had to struggle, starve and even grovel for work: his success was anything but assured.

Essentially a freelancer, he writes with seeming candidness of the many dry spells in a distinguished career that involved two successful television shows (The King of Kensington and Cagney and Lacey), dozens of film roles and television appearances, and many projects as producer and director, not all successful.

In That's What I Am, Waxman recounts his formidable early experiences with the CBC, his early film success in London, his extensive professional connections with both New York and Los Angeles, and his perennial return to Toronto, as if for air and sanity.

During one out-of-work spell, he worked flipping burgers at Barney's Beanery in Los Angeles; he used the experience decades later to film a scene in which he was essentially doing the same thing.

At the height of his Cagney and Lacey success, which made him recognizable to millions of television watchers, Waxman was jetting between California and Toronto several times each month, unwilling to severe his family's connection with Canada.

Likewise, he has clung tenaciously to his Jewish roots, resisting one agent's attempt to introduce him with a gentile name at an important meeting of would-be producers. "Gentlemen," he said, "I'm sorry, but I'm not an Albert Gardiner. I'm an Al Waxman. That's what I am. And there's nothing you can do about that."

As he relates, Waxman has rubbed shoulders with many greats, including Miller, Sammy Davis, Jr., Norman Jewison, Martha Graham, Sidney Lumet, Lou Jacobi and a pantheon of others. However, the names that recur most often are those of his wife, journalist Sara Waxman, and their children Tobaron and Adam.

Al Waxman

It was Sara, he confesses, who patiently helped him rearrange his priorities, putting family before career. That's the most important of many significant decisions that he recounts in this well-told tale.

There is an organic fullness to the book, which begins with the premature death of Aaron, Waxman's father, and ends with the actor directing the two hit plays Shayna Maidel and Sight Unseen at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts in North York, then taking on the role of Death of a Salesman at Stratford.

During a question-and-answer session, a student asked whether he is still looking for his own father, and he meaningfully replied: "No. I don't have to. I would like to, but I don't have to." That's yet another change that he realizes has occurred over the years.

A history of the Pale of Settlement in pictures

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In 1791, Catherine the Great, the anti-Semitic Russian czarina, signed a ukase maliciously designed to keep 1.5 million Jews under virtual house arrest.

They were confined to an area known as the Pale of Settlement, a vast territorial enclave stretching from the Baltic Sea to the Black Sea and encompassing present-day Russia, Poland, Ukraine, Belarus, Romania, the Baltic states and Eastern Hungary.

An organ grinder in Vilna.

By 1917, the year the ukase was abolished by the revolutionary Russian government, the Pale was home to about seven million Jews.

Ninety five percent of its inhabitants spoke Yiddish, the lingua franca of the Pale.

For all its cultural and religious richness, the Pale was no heaven on earth. Reacting to the twin evils of poverty and pogroms, Jews left in droves, bound for western Europe, Palestine, Canada, the United States and Australia.

In Yiddishland (Gingko Press), Gerard Silvain and Henri Minczeles recreate the Pale through the medium of remarkable black-and-white photographs.

Hundreds of these grace Yiddishland, illuminating cities like Vilna and Lodz, highlighting schools, synagogues and festivities, calling attention to culture and politics, and summoning up bitter memories of anti-Semitism.

The photos, in a word, are evocative.

In Vilna, the Jerusalem of Lithuania, we see Jewish women in shawls at a busy market, as well as men in hats and caps poring over prayer books.

In Lodz, the Polish Manchester, we see lines forming in front of a Jewish soup kitchen and benign German troops on Piotrkowska Street, the main thoroughfare.

Subsequent chapters record the nostalgic and the horrific – Jewish multitudes in dusty and remote shtetls attending to their business; curious crowds morbidly gaping at the corpses of Jews murdered in anti-Semitic onslaughts.

As might be expected, the book also deals with the terrible effects of famine on the population and with the Holocaust, the cataclysmic event which wiped out what was left of the shtetl in the Pale.

Yiddishland, then, brightens the soul and ravages the spirit.

Vilna's Jewish quarter.

Play memorializes actor's father

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's not often that a daughter writes and then performs in a play about her father, but Marlene Charney has done just that.

Her one-woman play, Father and Daughter, will be presented Tuesday, Jan. 18, at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care's Wagman Centre, at 7:30 p.m. as a fund-raiser for the Baycrest Centre Foundation.

Charney says her motivation for writing the play was her appreciation of the "amazing life" her father, Morris Charney, led. He died of a heart attack in October 1988, at age 79. A survivor of Auschwitz, he was co-owner of a restaurant on Adelaide Street West and a scrap metal dealer in later life.

"One of the things I learned from him was where hatred comes from," said the playwright, an actress and singer, who also teaches English as a second language.

"He was living in a small Polish village, where half the residents were Jewish and half were Polish, and as soon as the Nazis bombed Warsaw, the Polish butcher's son, his best friend, turned on him. In the crunch he found he couldn't count on him."

Marlene Charney

It was only in his last few years that her father started to talk about his Holocaust experiences, Charney said.

"My father had to raise my younger sisters, Cheryl and Michele, and myself, as my mother, Lillian, died in 1967, when we were quite young."

At the Baycrest performance, as in the earlier ones, she will be supported by Ruth Ruth and Ken Innes, members of the Friendly Spike Theatre Band.

NOTES FROM ALL OVER

The play consists of four short tales that are linked by an impulsive act in 1939 in the shadow of the Holocaust. "Despite its dark source, this is an evocative, funny, supremely moving play about the power of memory," according to a publicist.

More Dramatic Notes

• Building Jerusalem, a play set in Toronto on New Year's Eve of 1899, directed by Ross Manson, is "a brilliant collective creation of dance, music and text."

Previews Jan. 5 and 6; runs to Jan. 29. $16-$22. Factory Studio Theatre, 125 Bathurst St. 504-9971.

• The Canadian Stage Company rings in the (secular) New Year with a new production of Jason Sherman's award-winning modern parable, Patience, directed by Joseph Ziegler. Bluma Appel Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre. $26-$57. Previews begin Jan. 3. Runs Jan. 6 to Feb. 5.

• Stage Centre Productions presents The Matchmaker, by Thornton Wilder, directed by L. Garth Allen. Adults $16. Fairview Library Theatre. Jan. 13 to 29. 299-5557.

Capsule Review: Fans of mystery literature, take note. Jewish Lights Publishing has recently printed Mystery Midrash: An Anthology of Jewish Mystery & Detective Fiction. The book is edited by Lawrence W. Raphael and includes works by 13 authors, including novelist Faye Kellerman and Toronto writer Howard Engel. Other authors include Toni Brill, Richard Fliegel, Michael Kahn, Stuart Kaminsky, James Yaffe and Batya Swift Yasgur.

As Raphael points out in his insightful introduction, good mystery fiction is like the story of Creation, in that it "begins with chaos and ends with everything solved and in its place." And God "plays detective," Raphael says, when asking Eve why she tasted the forbidden fruit and Cain what happened to his brother Abel.

"The mystery is all about right and wrong, crime and punishment, justice and mercy," he writes. "And isn't every gumshoe in some sense a rabbi, scouring the mean streets or the sacred texts to get to the truth?"

Available in major bookstores.

In the Spotlight: David Mendel Harduf is a prolific writer and scholar, author of over 30 books in a variety of Judaic fields, including Hebrew and Yiddish lexicography, midrashic and modern Hebrew literature.

A Torontonian, Harduf has also published a unique edition of the Pentateuch and the first prophets, with traditional commentaries and a Rashi script that won him a prestigious award from the Bar-Ilan University in Tel Aviv.

The eighth volume of Harduf's Transliterated English-Hebrew Dictionary is just off the press, covering the letter R to Remit in English. The book features numerous quotations and examples of correct Hebrew usage, drawn from the Jewish classical sources and from modern Hebrew literature.

According to the American Reference Book (1995), Harduf "follows and supplements Eliezer Ben-Yehuda's 16-volume Complete Dictionary of Ancient and Modern Hebrew (1908-1959)."

Naomi Bell recites the history of European Jewry in Yiddish songs

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yiddish folk songs, whether happy or sad, tell the story of a people who broke free of shtetl life, endured sweatshops in the Russian Pale of Settlement, and then went looking for the golden medina in North America, says Naomi Bell.

That's why she sings about women betrothed or spurned, mothers saying goodbye to their children leaving for America, or the greena cusina abandoned by her lover in the new land, using lullabies for babies, songs of joy by hard-working immigrants, and the laments of women and men bent over sewing machines, watching their dreams turn to dust.

Accompanying herself on the piano, she likes to tell how each song she sings fits into the life cycle of Jews in Europe in the latter half of the 19th century and the early years of the 20th century, including the waves of immigrants who landed in Halifax or on Ellis Island.

The daughter of a learned rabbi and teacher, Bell developed her love of Yiddish at home at an early age, and there is nothing she likes better than to tell others about the beauty of Yiddish and why its folksongs teach history better than any text. To her, Yiddish words are pearls that fall from the lips, enfolding a world that lives on in its myriad culture.

She is giving three concerts in January – Jewish music month. The first, titled The Yiddish Folk Songs – Portrait of a People, is on Sunday, Jan. 16, at 8 p.m. at Darchei Noam Synagogue, 15 Hove St.

On Friday, Jan. 21, at 8.30 p.m. following an Oneg Shabbat service at Temple Har Zion, 7360 Bayview Ave., Thornhill, she will give a concert titled From The Shtetl to America – Songs of The Golden Land.

Her third concert will be a sing-along for the Friends of Yiddish at Workmen's Circle, 471 Lawrence Ave. W., at 2.30 p.m. on Sunday Jan. 23, titled Yiddish Lovesongs To Warm The Heart. Song sheets with musical annotations will be distributed to the audience.

Bell has collected and researched thousands of Yiddish and Hebrew folksongs. So thorough is her research that at one or more of the concerts, she will provide the text of the seldom-heard second and third stanzas of Abraham Goldfadden's Raisins and Almonds.

Only the first part of Goldfadden's well-known song made its way into anthologies, she explained. But the later portions tell a more meaningful and less sentimental tale, she said.

Bell has been scholar-in-residence at Temple Sholom in Chicago, where she gave two workshops. She lectured at the Second International Yiddish Conference in Toronto; and at the 1996 convention of the American Conference of Cantors (Reform), she received a standing ovation for her two workshops on Yiddish song.

On graduating from the University of Toronto, she received the Governor General's silver medal in English literature. For more than 20 years, she taught music at Hebrew and Yiddish schools, and was music director of Bialik Hebrew Day School for 10 years.

EXHIBITS IN NEW YORK, CHICAGO & WASHINGTON

Interesting Jewish-themed exhibits have opened recently, or will open soon, in museums in New York, Chicago and Washington, D.C. Here are the details:

• Berlin Metropolis: Jews and the New Culture, 1890-1914, looks at the rapidly growing Jewish community of Berlin at a time of strong urban growth and change. More than 250 objects are featured, including works by important artists, books, letters, posters and theatre memorabilia. Until April 23. Jewish Museum, 1109 Fifth Ave., New York. 212-423-3271.

• Shaping Of A Community: The Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Chicago is an exhibit that explores the development of philanthropy in the Chicago Jewish community over the last century. At the Spertus Museum, Chicago. Jan.16 to Dec. 31. 312-322-1747.

• Life Reborn: Jewish Displaced Persons, 1945-1951, focuses on the experience of Holocaust survivors in the aftermath of liberation. The exhibit opened in December and runs to May 21. A three-day international conference on the subject takes place Jan. 14 to 17. United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, Washington, D.C. 202-488-0400.

Passover Programs: The top-rated resort in the United States, according to Conde Nast, is the Ritz-Carlton Palm Beach Resort & Spa, which received a near-perfect 95.5 rating for service. This year, for the eighth consecutive year, Resort Classics is offering a Passover program at the Ritz-Carlton Palm Beach and also at three other American hotels.

For the second year running, Resort Classics is offering a Passover program at the Loews Miami Beach. The company is also offering Passover programs at the Coronado Island Marriott Resort & Spa in San Diego and the San Diego Paradise Point Resort. All programs include elegant seders, synagogue services, three gourmet meals daily, tearooms, evening entertainment and more.

In Florida, the programs are under Orthodox rabbinic supervision of the ORB under the direction of Rabbi Berel Simpser. The California programs are supervised by the Vaad HaRabonim of San Diego under the direction of Rabbi J. Wohlgelernter. 323-933-4044. Web site, www.passoverresorts.com.

King David Crowned: The American Association of Travel Editors, in an annual survey, has named the King David Hotel in Jerusalem as one of the top 10 hotels of the world.

"We are delighted that the King David has once again been recognized for its high standard of service, cuisine and accommodation," said Rafi Baeri, the hotel's chief of marketing and sales.

The high-circulation travel magazine Travel & Leisure also recently chose the King David as one of the top five hotels of Africa and the Middle East.

Beth Hatefutsoth: The incredible story of the Viennese Jewish physician Dr. Jakob Rosenfeld, who became a senior medical officer in Mao Tse-tung's Revolutionary Army, is the focus of an exhibition now on view at Tel Aviv's Museum of the Diaspora, or Beth Hatefutsoth.

Dr. Rosenfeld was one of some 20,000 Jewish refugees from Austria and Germany who found refuge from Nazi persecution in Shanghai. He served in the Communist Army from 1941 to 1949 as the equivalent of a general. After being rejected for admission to the United States, he went to Israel and died in Tel Aviv in 1952. The exhibit continues into February.

Also at Beth Hatefutsoth is Jewish Pilgrims, an exhibit that focuses on the Jews of North Africa who often make pilgrimages to the graves of prominent rabbis; and the Chassidim who travel by the thousands to Ukraine on Rosh Hashanah for prayer and prostration at the grave of Rabbi Nahman of Bratslav in Uman, and other revered sages.

Dora-winning play at St. Lawrence Centre

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The award-winning play Patience by Jason Sherman is being revived at the Bluma Appel Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre, Jan. 6 to Feb. 5.

This important drama, which won a Dora award and a Chalmers award, is by a playwright who has received more honours than any other Canadian playwright of his generation.

Jason Sherman

It will likely have a larger audience this time, since the Bluma Appel can seat four times as many people as the Tarragon, where Patience first opened.

It is a play with strong Jewish content, though Sherman told The CJN that it would be just as relevant if its anti-hero, Reuben Field, an aggressive enterpreneur at the beginning of the play, was a non-Jew.

"A lot of my experience is with Jewish people and this is reflected in my plays," said the playwright, who is Jewish and one of eight brothers.

"My characters are people who are struggling in their lives – and they could be Jewish or non-Jewish."

In Patience, Reuben's world suddenly collapses, and he loses his wife and business career. A big deal he has been counting on, the sale of cellphones to a foreign country, goes sour.

In trying to figure out where he went wrong, Reuben reviews his life. One of the characters who puts Reuben's Jewishness into perspective is a wise-cracking, singing rabbi.

"My own hope is that the audience willl leave the theatre believing that Reuben has decided to live the rest of his life searching for love, instead of the way he has lived in the past," Sherman said.

The new production of Patience is being presented in partnership with the Grand Theatre in London, Ont., and is directed by Joseph Ziegler.

The cast includes Jim Mezon, Victor Ertmanis, David Storch, Brenda Robins, Brenda Bazinet and Nicole Libin.

Jack Austin: Canada China Business Council

Canada to benefit from trade accord with China

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jack Austin wants a slice of the pie, however small it may be.

China, in the next five years, will spend approximately $1.5 trillion (US) in infrastructure projects as part of a plan to modernize itself.

Canada stands to profit handsomely from China's ambitions.

Canadian companies can realistically snag two percent to three percent of the contracts, worth about $5 billion a year, said Austin, president of the Canada China Business Council (CCBC) and a member of Canada's Senate.

Austin and the CCBC, a private-sector organization which facilitates and promotes trade and investment between Canada and China, are riding high these days.

Late last year, at CCBC's annual meeting in Toronto, the Canadian and Chinese governments signed a bilateral trade agreement. It comes into effect after China joins the World Trade Organization in 2001.

The accord, which is expected to increase bilateral trade from $10 billion today to $25 billion by 2005, will certainly benefit Canada, said Austin in an interview on the very day it was signed at Metro Toronto's Convention Centre.

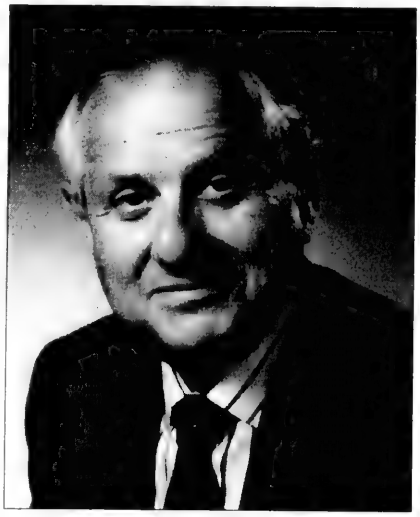
Canada's trade with China currently produces over 10,000 jobs in Canada, directly and indirectly. Imagine how many more it will generate in the near future?

Austin, who was prime minister Pierre Trudeau's chief of staff from 1974 to 1975, can rightfully bask in the afterglow of the agreement.

CCBC, whose membership is composed of some 260 Canadian firms active or interested in the China market, pushed hard for it as Canadian and Chinese negotiators hammered out the details in intensive talks.

"We made a real contribution to this pact," said Austin, a Harvard-trained lawyer who specializes in international business law. "Without our contribution, the Canadian government might have been operating in the dark."

Austin, 67, has been president of the CCBC since 1992. But his involvement with China stretches back to the early 1970s, when he was deputy minister of energy, mines and resources in the federal government.



Jack Austin

In 1970, he was one of six deputy ministers who accompanied Canada's first official mission to China.

Since then, he has travelled to China almost 100 times as a government minister, as China manager of Boughton Peterson Yang Anderson – the Vancouver law firm he is associated with – and as president of the Toronto-based CCBC.

Whatever hat he has worn, Austin, an old China hand, has been in the thick of Canadian-Sino relations.

In 1966, when China was internationally isolated, he was closely identified with a group in the Liberal party advocating Canadian recognition of the People's Republic of China. The resolution passed, and four years later, Canada and China opened diplomatic relations.

"It was an outrageous idea for some people at that time," recalled Austin. "But the possibility of a peaceful world without China was unacceptable. You can't take 22 percent of the world's population and place them beyond the pale."

In the past three decades, Austin has met every Chinese prime minister and two Chinese presidents. In 1984, he hosted the first trip by a Chinese prime minister to Canada. On behalf of the CCBC, he organized the Team Canada trip to China in 1994, headed by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and joined by 363 entrepreneurs.

And in the last four years, he has planned the Canadian itineraries of Premier Li Peng, President Jiang Zemin and Prime Minister Zhu Rongji.

It's clear that Austin has an affinity with China. "I feel very comfortable in China and very respectful of what the Chinese have achieved. China has changed tremendously since my first trip."

As he remembers it, China was largely an agrarian society dwelling in the past and all but untouched by advances in technology.

On the cusp of a new millennium, China is fast evolving into a modern industrial country.

A pragmatist, Austin subscribes to the view that Canada's trade agreement with China is beneficial for both trade and human rights.

Like International Trade Minister Pierre Pettigrew, he contends that trade leads to development and that development spawns human rights and the rule of law.

"Engagement and exchanges are of value. This will bring about a system of human rights closer to ours. Our interest is to promote prosperity in China."

China today, he added, is "the freest" it has ever been in terms of personal rights. But given its collectivist culture and traditions, China can only go so far with respect to adopting Western-style democratic reforms, he suggested.

Come November, Austin plans to join Team Canada's second foray into China. Once again, CCBC is organizing the business side of it.

Spending weekends with his wife Natalie, whose father Harry Veiner was mayor of Medicine Hat, Alta., for 22 years, he works a day in Vancouver, heads off to Ottawa for three days to attend to his Senate duties, and rounds off the week by tending to CCBC affairs.

"I consider myself a bifunctional Canadian," he said. "I'm comfortable in the private and public sectors. It's a very rich life."

Born in Calgary, the son of a rancher and grocer originally from Kiev, Ukraine, Austin was educated at the University of British Columbia, Harvard Law School and the University of California (Berkeley). He and his wife have three daughters.

Before becoming a civil servant, he taught law for two years at the University of British Columbia.

In 1981, Trudeau appointed him minister of state for Indian and northern affairs. Subsequently, he sat in cabinet as minister of state for social development, minister of state for the Canada Development Investment Corporation, and minister for Expo '86 in Vancouver.

He was also a member of the inner cabinet's executive committee, responsible for control of Canada's social programs.

Austin maintains friendly ties with Trudeau, and usually sees him once a month. In fact, he organized Trudeau's 80th birthday bash in Ottawa.

Although he is chair of the Senate's rules committee, Austin's interests run from banking and aboriginal affairs to international trade. He has no intention of retiring. "I'm staying until they kick me out. I enjoy public policy."

And, of course, Austin will go on promoting Canadian trade with China, where the sky seems to be the limit.

Rotman researchers explore aging and brain use

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As we get older we use different parts of our brain to remember faces and words.

This is a simple statement but it has three researchers at the Rotman Research Institute of the Baycrest Centre on the edge of their chairs.

They developed this finding by taking pictures of the brains of young and old healthy volunteers by using PET (positive emission-tomography) scans. Then they analysed where the activity in their brains was taking place as the pictures of faces and pairs of words flashed in front of their eyes.

Rotman scientists, Dr. Cheryl Grady, Dr. Randy McIntosh and Dr. Brian Levine, all psychologists, found that older people are using both the left and right side of their frontal lobes, while the younger ones are using only the right side.

Frontal lobes have been studied by scientists as the part of the brain that controls memory.

The Rotman scientists findings indicate that older people developed an ability to use a part of their brains they didn't use when they were younger.

The scientists were surprised and excited by what they saw. For one thing, if older people can adapt by using different parts of their brains, there is hope that future research will show how they can adapt to changes in their lives.

In the long term, and researchers are cautious about this, the findings may show how to prevent loss of memory which results in Alzheimer's disease as well as other forms of dementia.

The Rotman Research Institute has been recognized as one of the top five neuroscientific centres in the world because of work of this kind, said Dr. Levine.

A new type of scan at Sunnybrook Hospital will become available to Rotman volunteers, and will be used to discover how people in their 40s and 50s use their brains to remember faces and words. The findings will then be compared with the results from the younger and older volunteers.

The new scans have become available to Baycrest because it is is now part of a five hospital network. The network stands to get $20 million in federal, provincial, private and corporate funds to promote brain imaging.

Baycrest will get $3 million of this amount, said Dr. Donald Stuss, director, Rotman Institute, and vice-president of research, Baycrest Institute.

Half of the $20 million is promised by the federal government. The other hospitals in the network are Sunnybrook, Hospital for Sick Children, Centre for Addiction and Mental Health and Toronto Hospital.

The flow of funds means that Rotman will get new state of the art equipment for its scientists.

None of this research would be possible without the volunteers. The three scientists urge young and old in the community, who want to help out, to get in touch with the Rotman Research Institute, 416-785-2500, ext. 2080.

Baycrest Centre doctor to receive award

TORONTO — One of the Canada's leading physicians in the care of the elderly is being honoured by the council of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario.

Dr. Michael Gordon, vice-president of medical services at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, is one of four recipients of the 1999 Council Award, which honours physicians who demonstrate excellence as medical experts, communicators, collaborators, resource managers, health advocates, self-directed learners, scientists and scholars, and individuals. Gordon will receive his award on Feb. 24.

As an expert in his field, Gordon is consulted by his peers, numerous health care facilities and agencies, and all levels of government. He is known internationally from his many academic articles and two acclaimed books, Old Enough to Feel Better – A Medical Guide for Seniors and An Ounce of Prevention – The Canadian Guide to a Healthy and Successful Retirement.

But perhaps most importantly, his patients and their family members praise him for his tremendous compassion, his warm and caring manner, and his breadth of knowledge in all aspects of patient care.

Gordon is also head of geriatrics and internal medicine at Baycrest, and head of the division of geriatrics at Mount Sinai Hospital. As a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada in internal medicine and geriatric medicine, he carries the distinction of having been one of the first geriatricians to be certified in Canada (in 1981).

It's hockey night at the JCC!

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Every Sunday night is hockey night at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

From September until the end of May, starting at 3 p.m. in the main gym, men of all ages sweat and make shifty stick-handling moves as they sprint up the floor with the plastic puck.

Childhood dreams come rushing back; they fantasize they are Leafs playing in front of a packed house in Maple Leaf Gardens. They try to make that perfect play so they can have something to brag about beside the water cooler at work the next day.

This men's adult hockey league, which began approximately 24 years ago, has grown over time and through reputation, from two to 10 teams; 84 people currently participate, with 20 still on the waiting list.

Veteran player Larry Wronzberg, who has been playing since the birth of this league, helped get the Sunday tradition rolling.

"The gym staff would play the swim staff. Then through word of mouth, it went from two teams to 10. There are five games played. Each game lasts an hour," he said.

Despite the fact that this league is made up of adults who play only once a week, each game and shift is played just like an overtime contest in late June for the Stanley Cup.

"We are very competitive. Everyone plays to win within the rules. It doesn't matter that about 80 percent of the guys here know each other. We have refs that will kick people out of the league if they are too rough in the games," Wronzberg said.

At the end of the regulation season, the teams must start the long and treacherous journey of the best-of-three playoff rounds. Each player gives his all in order to claim the trophies and shirts that go along with being on the winning team. There are also prizes given out to the leading scorers of the season.

Making his debut one Sunday night was a recent university grad named Barry Riz. As he waited on a bench by the gym, he took a few minutes to reflect on why he decided to get involved in this competitive league.

"I first heard about it through a friend of mine who played for two years. I wanted to wait until I was out of school before giving it a try. It is a chance to meet people and to play competitive hockey. My competitiveness is definitely still there," he said.

Riz seemed to fit right in and did not seem out of place despite being a raw green rookie in this 27-game season of knocks and bruises.

One veteran player who grew up with the league and made a crucial contact is Isaac Shnieder.

Shnieder, who started playing when he was 16, met a person in hockey who helped him with a key purchase in his life.

"I met a real estate agent. He really helped me buy the right house," he said.

These players, when not hammering each other on the gym floor, get together for special occasions to have fun and celebrate particular sporting events.

"We used to have a Super Bowl party," he said.

When playing, there are no set positions for the men to play. Usually, they are asked where they want to play, and they play it.

In order to see some good hard-fought games involving people who play for the love of the competition of hockey, visit the Jewish Community Centre every Sunday night to 8 p.m.

Samaranch resignation unnecessary: Pound

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — There was no need for Juan Antonio Samaranch to resign as head of the International Olympic Committee last year, says IOC first vice-president Richard Pound.

Calls for Samaranch's departure in the wake of last year's Olympic Games bribery scandal were unreasonable, because it would not have been fair "to destroy 20 years of good work in the Olympic movement," Pound said.

The scandal involved revelations in November 1998 that IOC officials had accepted gifts to have Salt Lake City chosen as the site for the winter Games in 2002, and Sydney, Australia, as the site for the 2000 summer Games. Both cities were selected.

But Pound, a Montreal lawyer and accountant who has been named as Samaranch's possible successor, said Samaranch's critics were unfair.

"The calls to resign came from those who didn't understand the IOC and thought it should disappear," he told a recent gathering of the Jewish Chamber of Commerce.

"We're not a corporation. We meet once a year, and our president and members are all volunteers," said Pound, a former Canadian Olympic swimmer named by the IOC to investigate the scandal.

Pound pointed to the fact that about a dozen IOC officials were forced to resign as a result of the scandal. The IOC also instituted a series of reforms to ensure that similar scandals don't happen again.

They include an eight-year term limit for the IOC presidency, and the election to the IOC of 15 active Olympic athletes, at the time of the Games.

In his talk, Pound praised the IOC, particularly the advances the IOC has seen over the last two decades at both the political and the "marketing" levels.

In the past, the Olympics have bee used as a platform for political causes – including the 1936 German Games used by Adolf Hitler to showcase the glories of Nazism, the 1972 Munich massacre and the 1984 Los Angeles Games boycotted by the Soviet Union.

Since then, he said, the IOC has served more and more to bring the world together, and has seen full participation at the Games by some 200 nations in about 20 sports.

Pound said the movement has even succeeded in finding a formula to have both China and Taiwan compete, and South Africa, once expelled from the movement, was welcomed back after apartheid was ended.

The IOC, he said, also made it possible for Israel to compete in the Olympic movement, and it is welcoming the participation of smaller, developing nations, all as part of one of its basic principles of "universality."

"For a little organization in Lausanne with 70 or 80 members, that's not such a bad record."

From a marketing perspective, Pound said, the Olympic movement has also seen phenomenal growth.

Two decades ago, the IOC had no financial resources or "leverage," while continuing to strive to remain autonomous and free of government controls.

Now, the granting of television rights to broadcast the Games and rights to corporate sponsorship are restricted to a very small number of corporations who pay vast sums for their "exclusivity."

It took some time to get this new marketing approach into the minds of IOC members, he said, but they eventually accepted the notion that "to get value, you had to give value."

Now, only companies such as Coca-Cola have the right to use the Olympic symbol of five interlocking rings, "the most recognized symbol in the world. Any other companies that try feel the full brunt of the IOC.

"If you're our marketing partner, you know we will protect you," Pound said.

Marketing revenues now account for half of the Olympic movement's income, with television rights providing the other half, he said.

Revenues from the 2000 Sydney Games are forecast at $1.25 billion. By the time the Games get to Athens four years later, revenue is expected to reach $1.5 billion.

For the sponsors, the high fees are well worth it, Pound said. NBC in the United States is paying over $5 billion for the rights to broadcast the Games through 2008, even though it has still not been decided where those Games will be. But revenues for NBC during the 1996 Games in Atlanta totalled close to $1 billion.

"The U.S. market still remains the most important single market," Pound said.

The offshoot of all this is that with the level of such sponsorship, cities now "don't have to spend a penny" to host the Games. Except for the infrastructure costs, "the Olympics can finance themselves."

Stories that touch the heart

By ALEC GELCER & ELI RUBENSTEIN

What To Look For

The legendary Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach was once scheduled to officiate at a wedding. The driver came to pick him up. On the way, the driver was weaving through traffic, not driving as expertly as Shlomo would have liked.

A police officer pulled the car over. "Where's your driver's licence?"

"I have to take you into the station," the officer retorted matter of factly.

But then Shlomo intervened: "Officer, I'm on my way to a wedding," Shlomo pleaded. "If we are delayed further, hundreds of people will be inconvenienced and the bride and groom will be hopelessly disappointed.

"The driver is really a good person but a bit absent-minded. Please do us a favour. Let us proceed to the wedding and I promise you we will get someone else to drive the car back home. He is really a nice young man, and I promise that you can trust his word if he says some one else will return the car."

The policeman began to respond, then paused as if puzzled. He looked at Shlomo and said: "There's a difference between you and me, and I envy it. You see, I go around looking for the bad in people. But you go around looking for the good in people."

The police officer let them go with a warning. Shlomo and his driver arrived on time for the wedding and the festivities lasted all night long.

Who You Really Hurt

Rabbi Haim of Brisk (the Brisker Rav) found himself on a train with three Jewish card-players. Needing a fourth, they asked him to join them. But the Brisker Rav, obviously more interested in study than in card-playing, politely refused. The men kept insisting, but the Brisker Rav still refused.

Finally, one man lost his temper and said: "Well if that's the case, then get out of our compartment," and he slapped the rabbi across the face and physically forced the Brisker Rav to move to another part of the train.

When the train arrived in Brisk, the irate card player couldn't help noticing the crowd that had come to greet the rabbi as he alighted from the train. The man inquired about his identity. When he was told who he was, the man felt enormous regret: "Look who I have slapped and insulted! One of the great sages of our time!"

Immediately he sought out the Brisker Rav to ask for forgiveness, but the the Brisker Rav refused to even see him. This went on for a year, until the man managed to corner the the Brisker Rav. He said to him: "Why won't you see me? You know it is your obligation to forgive me if I ask for it. And I am begging you for your forgiveness. I had no idea it was you, the Brisker Rav, that I was insulting!"

Replied the the Brisker: "That's just it. I refused to see you because I can't forgive you. Why? Because it was not me you wronged. You had no idea it was me. You thought I was a poor simple Jew from Brisk who you could treat with impunity.

"In order to obtain forgiveness for your actions," the rabbi continued, "you must approach every poor, simple Jew in Brisk and ask their forgiveness. It was they who you insulted, not me!"

About Life

Dear Ella,

I have been contemplating making a New Year's Resolution for the year 2000.

As a rule, I have not believed in doing this, as I do most of my soul searching around Rosh Hashanah and leave the partying for the evening of Dec. 31.

However, I am feeling different about this New Year because it is the end of the 1900s and the beginning of the 2000s.

If I ever needed an excuse for a positive change in my life this would be as good a reason as any.

I've always kept away from resolutions because I feel they can set you up for failure and I might end up more depressed than if I had let the evening pass like any other.

Do you have any suggestions as to how to succeed in keeping New Year's resolutions? Do you think I should just forget this silliness and go about my life on Jan. 1 as I did on Dec. 31?

Resolution vs. Dissolution

Dear Resolution vs. Dissolution

A New Year's resolution can be the beginning of a positive change or addition in your life.

Keeping it depends on a few things: How committed you are, how many resolutions you make, and how realistic they are.

You will be more successful at keeping a resolution if you have been thinking about it for awhile than if you go for one that popped into your head on New Year's Eve.

Successful resolutions require a certain amount of thought and psyching yourself up, or they really weren't that important to you in the first place and stand the highest chance of failure.

Don't over-resolution yourself. We all have many areas in our lives we would like to improve. However, if you cut your will power and time short by dividing them into too many areas, you are setting yourself up for disappointment.

Keep your resolutions realistic. Don't expect to loose 20 pounds in two weeks; don't expect to raise your grades by studying hard for one test; and don't expect to run a mile immediately if you haven't been off the couch for awhile.

Resolutions take thought, commitment and time. Good luck.

Happy New Year. May the year 2000 bring peace, happiness and goodwill to all.

Century's first quadruplets?

Five days after new year, babies arrive

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Chaya and David Engel now have 10 children, not unusual in the Orthodox community. What they never expected was that the latest four would come all at once.

The Engels are the parents of what the Jewish General Hospital believes are the first quadruplets of the millennium in the world, and certainly the first in North America.

Their three sons and one daughter were born Jan. 5 by Caesarean section just before 1:30 p.m. They arrived 29 weeks into Engel's pregnancy (11 weeks before term) and weighed between 1,152 and 1,325 grams.

Chief neonatologist Dr. Apostolos Papageorgiou said the babies were in "very stable condition," adding, "The prognosis is excellent for all four." He expected they would remain in hospital for two months.

The mother was also doing very well after the birth and had avoided the complications sometimes associated with multiple pregnancy, such as high blood pressure and diabetes, said Dr. Julia Solomon, a specialist in high-risk obstetrics.

All of the babies were placed in incubators in the JGH's neonatal intensive care unit. One of the boys received oxygen through a tube to his trachea to regulate his breathing, but he was expected to be weaned in a few days. The other three were receiving the "slight support" of puffs of oxygen through nasal tubes, said Papageorgiou.

Dad was looking exhausted and a bit stunned, but described himself as "extremely happy." He did not sleep the night before or after the birth, and was back at the hospital at 5 a.m. the next day.

The News in Brief

Canada

Weiz Hires Greenspan

TORONTO — Well-known Toronto criminal lawyer Edward Greenspan has joined the legal team representing Daniel Weiz, the 19-year-old Israeli soldier being held as a suspect in the murder of Matti Baranovski. Greenspan was retained by Weiz's lawyer in Israel to represent Weiz should he be extradited to Canada to face charges in Baranovski's Nov. 14 slaying.

Greenspan told reporters last week that Canada has yet to issue a formal request for Weiz's extradition, and has offered no evidence to support a case against him.

Canada has until early February to request Weiz's extradition.

Earlier this month, an Israeli judge rejected a request that Weiz be released from jail pending the extradition request.

Israel

Chinese President to Visit

JERUSALEM — Chinese President Jiang Zemin is due to visit Israel this spring, according to the Israeli daily Ha'aretz. Jiang is expected to meet with Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat. Jiang's visit had been threatened by Beijing's displeasure over a recent visit to Israel by the exiled spiritual leader of Tibet, the Dalai Lama.

Rabin Sign Vandalized

JERUSALEM — A memorial sign near the entrance to Yitzhak Rabin Boulevard in Jerusalem was vandalized last week. The incident occurred several days after Jewish extremists threatened to damage Rabin's grave in retaliation for the dismantling of a memorial plaza at the Kiryat Arba grave of Baruch Goldstein, who murdered 29 Muslim worshippers in a Hebron mosque in 1994. Security guards have been stationed around Rabin's grave.

Peres for President?

JERUSALEM — Senior Labour party officials are supporting former prime minister Shimon Peres as a candidate for president if the current president, Ezer Weizman, leaves the post, Ha'aretz reported. A probe into nearly $500,000 that Weizman received from a French millionaire has prompted speculation in Israel that he may be forced to step down.

Women May Serve

JERUSALEM — The Knesset has passed a law that opens the way for women to serve in combat units in the Israeli army. The law might also extend the number of years women serve in the army from two years to three and allow them to serve reserve duty. It gives legal backing to a trend already underway in the army to have women in increased fighting roles.

Millennial Twins

JERUSALEM — An Israeli woman has given birth to twins – in different millennia. Sigal Gilboa gave birth to a daughter two minutes before midnight on Dec. 31, and a son born just after midnight on Jan. 1, 2000.

Nazi Allegations

STOCKHOLM — A top Swedish politician is calling on his country's prime minister to set up a historical commission to investigate revelations that more than 250 Swedes were members of the Nazi SS. The comments by the leader of Sweden's opposition Christian Democratic Party came after a television documentary last week made the revelation, and before Sweden hosts an international conference on the Holocaust later this month.

Kalejs Returns

CANBERRA — A war crimes suspect recently discovered living in Britain returned last week to Australia. Konrad Kalejs, an Australian citizen is alleged to have been an official in a the Latvian security police that killed up to 30,000 Jews. He left England after the British government threatened to deport him. The United States and Canada have already deported him.

Mixed Reviews for Putin

MOSCOW — Jewish observers both in Russia and in the United States have given mixed reactions to Vladimir Putin's ascent to the Russian presidency. Rabbi Zinovy Kogan, a leader in Russia's Reform movement, said Putin recently spoke "very warmly" about Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak, saying Barak supports "Russia's position over fighting terrorism in Chechnya." But Micah Naftalin, national director of the Washington-based Union of Councils for Soviet Jews, said Putin "has risen to power on the back of a racist war which appeals to the worst xenophobic instincts of the Russians."

Election Good News

ZAGREB — The Jewish community here is welcoming the results of Croatia's recent parliamentary elections. The apparent victory of a centre-left coalition in last Monday's vote marks the end of a highly nationalistic regime led by the late president, Franjo Tudjman. The coalition has promised to build bridges to the West, which, according to historian Ivo Goldstein, is good news for Croatia's 2,000 Jews.

Jacob Ghermezian Dies at 97

EDMONTON — Jacob Ghermezian, patriarch of the Orthodox Jewish family that built a real estate empire worth billions of dollars, died here last week at the age of 97.

The Ghermezians were perhaps best known for having built the mammoth $1.1 billion West Edmontor Mall, the world's largest shopping mall. The family also owns a 22.5 percent share in the Mall of America in Bloomington, Minn., which, after a planned renovation, will become the world's largest shopping centre.

Jacob Ghermezian, who was known as "Papa," was a rug merchant and developer in his native Tehran, Iran. He, his wife and their four sons left the country in the 1950s and lived in New York and Montreal before settling in Edmonton.

Known for its reclusiveness, the family was involved in many local Jewish endeavours, including running a kolel. The clan also built Menorah Academy, an Orthodox day school.

A spokesman last week pointed out that the elder Ghermezian was a devout Jew who never conducted business on the Sabbath.

Former SS commander could walk free

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A former SS commander is in jail in Germany on war crime charges as a direct result of the testimony of a retired Montreal professor who served under him.

But Julius Viel may never be convicted if more eyewitnesses do not come forward to corroborate Adalbert Lallier's account.

Lallier, 74, voluntarily went to Stuttgart twice last year to make a statement to the German War Crimes Prosecutor's Office that he saw Viel cold-bloodedly murder seven forced labourers near the Theresienstadt concentration camp in Czechoslovakia in March, 1945.

Viel, 81, a former journalist for the newspaper Stuttgarter Zeitung, attempted to commit suicide in his cell and prosecutors want to go to trial sooner rather than later, said Steve Rambam, a New York private investigator.

Rambam's campaign to expose what he claimed was Canada's laxness in pursuing Nazi war criminals prompted Lallier to come forward.

Rambam has been gathering evidence for the past two years for the chief prosecutor, Kurt Schirmm, who has told him the trial could start in six to eight weeks.

"If we don't find at least one more witness, Julius Viel might walk away from the murders one more time," Rambam said. He is making an "urgent" appeal for additional witnesses or survivors of the attack to testify.

Viel was charged in 1964 in Germany for war crimes, but the case was closed when a key witness, another former SS member, died shortly before the trial. Viel then continued to live as an apparently respected member of the community in the town of Wangen in Allgau.

Rambam said one other witness has corroborated Lallier's story, a Jew from Austria and former Theresienstadt inmate, who was also digging an anti-tank ditch near Leitmeritz where the shooting allegedly took place.

There were about 1,500 inmates digging that day, Rambam said. "The vast majority of Theresienstadt inmates survived the war. Clearly, there must still be many people out there who saw what happened, and very likely there's a witness in Canada."

While two witnesses are enough to proceed to trial, Rambam fears that may not be enough evidence to convict Viel.

Lallier, who retired from teaching economics at Concordia University last May, said he went to Stuttgart in April and again in July to be questioned by the prosecutor's office, and that in December a German official came to Montreal to speak to him once more. Lallier said he is eager to tell everything he knows at the trial.

Lallier, a French Huguenot raised in Hungary, said he was inducted against his will into the Waffen SS at 17 in 1942. He was among the guards overseeing the ditch-digging, when suddenly he saw his commanding officer (Viel) start quickly shooting inmates in the ditch until his gun was empty.

Lallier said that he saw nothing that could have provoked the attack, and that the officer was not berserk. No one apprehended him, and he apparently suffered no consequences, even though higher ranking officers were present.

Contacted at his Eastern Townships home, Lallier said he gave the German prosecutors "quite a few names" of other SS members present at the shooting. He has been told they have denied knowledge of Court rejects appeal for Nazi collaborator

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Vladimir Katriuk, the first Quebecer to be judged a Nazi collaborator by the Federal Court of Canada, is a step closer to deportation. The Federal Court of Appeal recently ruled that he can't appeal his conviction.

The lawyers for Katriuk, an 80-year-old beekeeper from Ormstown, argued that denying Katriuk the right to appeal contravened the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

But Court of Appeal Justice Barry Strayer rejected the argument, saying the initial judgment against Katriuk last year was merely a preliminary finding and did not constitute a final decision to deport him.

According to Canada's Citizenship Act, there is no right to appeal for individuals found to have fraudulently entered Canada.

Katriuk was stripped of his citizenship following his conviction last January by the Federal Court of Canada. The court ruled that he came to Canada in 1951 under false pretenses. He acquired Canadian citizenship seven years later.

Katriuk was first notified by the citizenship minister of the intent to denaturalize him in August of 1996. Court proceeding against him began in December 1997, with final arguments presented in July 1998.

Throughout, Katriuk's lawyers steadfastly maintained his innocence, contending that their client was never questioned about his past when he applied for a Canadian visa.

In his ruling last January, Judge Marc Nadon found that Katriuk had gained illegal entry into Canada by using a false birth date and name – Nicholas Schpirka – and by concealing his membership in Waffen SS battalion 118, which was implicated in numerous atrocities in the Ukraine, including the deaths of thousands of Jews in Belarus between 1941 and 1944.

Although Nadon said there was no hard evidence Katriuk was directly involved in atrocities against civilians, he "was clearly not prepared to answer fully the questions put to him regarding his participation in Battalion 118."

Nadon ruled that when Katriuk applied in Paris to come to Canada, "he...must have been asked...details regarding the longest job he had in the last 10 years and the number of jobs he had during those 10 years.

"On the evidence before me, I can only find that the respondent [Katriuk] did not truthfully answer those questions.

"The respondent's evidence was simply that the visa officer did not ask him anything, I do not find his version of events plausible."

Delectable literary morsels

Writing is essential to the well-being of the human spirit. This is not an original thought. Nor is it particularly profound. Indeed it even sounds a bit trite. But it is a point that must be emphasized despite its obvious truth.

The human ability to write "transformed mankind," wrote Moses Mendelssohn. "We teach one another by writings; we learn to know nature and mankind out of writings; we toil and we repose over, edify and amuse ourselves with writings."

To the Jewish people especially, for whom text and the myriad derivative activities have been so singularly influential, writing is the essential breeze that fans the flame of our creativity.

That is why it is such a delight to greet the most recent volume, 1999-2000, of Parchment. It is the eighth edition of the annual independent journal, located at the Centre for Jewish Studies in York University, dedicated to contemporary Jewish writing.

Adam Fuerstenberg, Parchment's editor, and his team of four prose and poetry editors have compiled 210 pages of compelling reading. This year's edition is larger and "meatier" than any that have preceded it.

Once again, Fuerstenberg and his team have provided readers a cafeteria of delectable literary morsels balanced between well-known, established writers such as Norah Gold and Shel Krakofsky, and aspiring young writers such as Shira Honig and Adam Sol, to mention, unfairly, but a few.

The authors in this issue of Parchment include a number of writers whose works appear or have appeared in The Canadian Jewish News. This is very gratifying.

Encouraging creative Jewish writing, especially among the younger crop of writers, is an objective we share with Parchment. When we read the prose or the poetry of others, we are occasionally inspired to try our own hand at writing.

And there is much in this issue of Parchment that is inspiring, ranging from fiction, essays and poetry to an eye-opening, instructive full-length interview with award-winning author Lillian Nattel, in which she discloses a great deal of background information about the writing of her novel The River Midnight.

The prose is rich. To mention but two examples, the short story by Bill Gladstone, a regular contributor to The CJN, entitled The House of the Living is a gentle, multi-textured tale of sorrow and happiness. He combines his considerable writing skill with his considerable knowledge of genealogy to fashion an entertaining, delicate mystery/love story.

Lillian Nattel also offers a tale of love called The Colour of Shadows, more "modern" in its storyline, in which four disparate people struggle to tie the loose ends of their lives together into a meaningful, though unconventional, thread of commitment and caring.

The poetry is evocative. Robert Frost once wrote that "a poem... begins as a lump in the throat, a sense of wrong, a homesickness, a lovesickness...It finds the thought and the thought finds the words."

Many of these "Parchment poets" found the right words to express just the right thoughts. For example, in her poem entitled The Singer, Merle Nudelman captures what Frost called "the lump in the throat."

"Tender, soulful melodies, poignant images float fragrant from Leah's lips intensity building with each new song she reaches deeper tears away musical scraps of memory voice soaring in diamond pitch breaking light and sound into prisms.
Listeners quiver with emotion skin gooseflesh, minds moving inward to contented childhood days a simple life vanquished with the final stirring notes of song."

And there is so much more in this year's edition of Parchment. Anyone interested in good, new "Jewish" writing will enjoy it.

At the beginning of August, it was my melancholy duty to inform readers that ace reporter Paul Lungen would be leaving The CJN.

Six months later it is with profound relief and joy that I am able to announce we were able to get him back. As of this week, readers of The CJN will once again have the benefit of seeing Paul Lungen's excellent reportage in our pages.

Homelessness on agenda at USY convention

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ariel Greenbaum-Shinder sees homeless people now in a more positive light than she used to, she says.

"I think they do need the help of the community...They're still human beings, still created in God's image."

The Ottawa teen, a Grade-12 student at Canterbury High School, recently returned from United Synagogue Youth's 49th annual international convention in San Jose, Calif.

The convention's theme, community and responsibility in the Jewish tradition, held a particular resonance for Greenbaum-Shinder, 17, who is social action and tikkun olam vice-president of USY's eastern Canadian region (ECRUSY), which encompasses Ontario and Quebec.

She was one of about 30 Canadian delegates, including 14 from ECRUSY and 14 – mostly Vancouverites as well as representatives from Victoria and Calgary – from the Portland, Ore.-based Pinwheel region. Altogether, there were more than 800 delegates from across North America.

The students participated in a march for the homeless to raise funds and awareness. They met with homeless people before the march, which raised $20,000 (US).

"The best word I could use to describe the march is 'awesome,'" said Greenbaum-Shinder in a phone interview. "It was extremely powerful."

They also participated in Mitzvah Mania, a slew of activities designed to benefit underprivileged children, hospital patients and the elderly – for example, they wrote get-well cards.

"It was easy and creative," said Vancouverite Matthew Rossoff, 18, president of Pinwheel region. "Something like that you can bring back to the chapter. You can do that as a program."

Rossoff, a Grade-12 student at Charles E. London Secondary School, was also inspired by the fundraising component of the march. "Knowing we could raise so much money in a week was really motivating to try and bring that energy back to my city and my community."

Special interest sessions at the convention included AIDS awareness, careers in the Jewish community, groups with special needs, domestic violence, Israel and text study.

Jonathan Levinoff, ECRUSY president, found it inspiring to be in a Jewish environment with so many other teens "who believe in the same ideals as I do – the Conservative movement, and participating in social action programs and raising money for charity."

He expects that ECRUSY will try to follow up the convention with gemilut chasadim programs, such as visiting a seniors' residence and perhaps raising awareness of homeless people here.

For Levinoff, a Grade-12 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, a session on interdating and intermarriage opened his eyes to issues facing some of his counterparts in other cities, particularly those with smaller Jewish populations.

"In a lot of cases where USYers go to a high school with maybe five other Jews, there's very little alternative [to dating non-Jews]."

USY, the high school arm of the Conservative movement, "encompasses everything that I really enjoy," said Levinoff.

"I enjoy learning more about Judaism and going further than my Jewish education [at school]. It's also an opportunity to meet new people, not only from Toronto but across North America."

Sniderman remains a pillar on the Canadian arts scene

BY KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Last November at the 1999 Governor General's Performing Arts Awards in Ottawa, entrepreneur Sam Sniderman was presented with the Ramon John Hnatyshyn Award for Voluntarism in the Performing Arts.

Known to generations of Canadian music fans as "Sam the Record Man," Sniderman was honoured for his service to the community.

Sniderman continually takes time from his busy schedule as president of the retail record chain, Sam the Record Man, and its parent company Roblan Distributors, to lend his talents to a long list of Canadian organizations including the Toronto Arts Council, the Hamilton and Region Arts Council, the East Coast Music Association, the National Theatre School and Ontario's Humber College.

"That's my life and I'm happy to be part of it," Sniderman said. "Unfortunately, there are somethings I have to say no to. I really don't want to say no because there is so much to be done and people are so grateful when you've done something for them."

Sniderman readily accepts his role in the Canadian arts scene, he said. "I am delighted to be a part of just about every Canadian [musician] that has made it nationally or internationally for many years.

"Nobody worked their bones off as much as I did for them. I really found Canadian artists were very much accepted by the Canadian public. Unfortunately, the media didn't give them the attention they should have had."

His efforts on behalf of Canada's talented have been rewarded with a number of accolades. He has been named to the Order of Canada and he is a recipient of the Ontario Bicentennial Medal, he was honoured in the Canadian Country Music Hall of Fame, he won the 1989 Walt Grealis Award, given at the Canada's Juno Awards and an honorary doctor of commerce degree from Ryerson Polytechnic University.

Born in Toronto in 1920, Sniderman's first foray into the music business was as a salesman at his brother Sid's radio store on College Street in 1937.

"I learned the business through my mother, who had sold dry goods. She was a very wise woman and taught me all I know about the retail trade. We called her Captain Gert. We lived above the store, so she was always there to help," Sniderman said.

"The business began as Sniderman Radio Sales and Service Ltd., a long name with no money," he said with a chuckle. "Then it became Sniderman's Music Hall and with a lot of guts it became Sam the Record Man.

"I changed it to a record store. We started by selling foreign records to all the people who came across from Europe after the war and settled in the district."

The store prospered. Customers came from miles around to buy their records. Eventually the Sniderman brothers opened up on Yonge Street, just below Dundas in the basement of Yolles Furniture.

Outgrowing the space, in no time, Sam's took over Yolles' main floor. In 1961, they opened at their present-day Yonge Street location, where Sid, 93, still comes in to work every day.

Sniderman reflects back to his early days when the RCA Victor salesman, the late Lloyd Booth, gave him some encouraging words that he has never forgotten. Booth said, "Someday you'll be number 1, and there will be people treading on your heels, but there will be no one running in front of you throwing dirt in your face."

Launched first record franchise business

Sniderman went on to start the first record franchise business in North America.

The company never expanded to the United States because Sniderman simply saw no reason for it, he said. He proudly claims he is a very chauvinistic Canadian.

His son Robert followed him into the business before buying the Senator Restaurant. His other son Jason runs Roblan Distributors with Sid's daughter Lana.

Although a hip replacement a few years ago ended his budding tennis career, The Record Man shows no signs of slowing down. When in town, Sniderman still goes to the office every day. "I want to retire all the time, but no one will let me."

BJC's seniors services supervisor set to retire

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Teme Kernerman is retiring as supervisor of senior adult services at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) Jan 25.

"I'm not hanging up my shoes so I can sit on a couch and watch TV," she said. "I'm going to take a breather and then keep going."

Kernerman plans to continue teaching dance, the field in which first she made her reputation at the BJC.

Teme Kernerman

In fact part of her job was also to be co-ordinator of folkdance, including the Rikudiyah Israeli dance festival, now in its 30th year.

"There has never been a day when I didn't want to come to work, it's been so challenging and creative," said the woman who has worked for 36 years at the BJC and its predecessors, and at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

At the BJC, since she became supervisor of the 55 plus group, the membership of that department has risen to 1,500, as she and her colleagues introduced meaningful recreational activities.

"Seniors are living longer and healthier lives. They want to keep going and doing things," she said.

Now seniors have the option of joining performing groups in drama, dance or choir, attending current events lectures and discussions, playing cards in the lounge, and participating in entertainment lunches on Tuesdays, a host of activities with Judaic themes and courses in bridge, tai-chi and yoga with the Toronto board of education.

There are also day trips and overnight trips, including excursions to Holocaust memorial centres across the border.

Kernerman keeps fit without swimming or running on the track, even though the facilities to do so are just outside her office door. Instead, she burns up the calories, and tones up her muscles, by teaching dance.

"We go the equivalent of four or five miles in a dance class. It's wonderful therapy and wonderful exercise."

Professionally trained as a dancer, Kernerman and her husband, Barry, an art dealer, lived in Israel from 1960 to 1968, where she taught modern dance and folkdance.

Their two children, Doron, 39, of Mississauga, and Varda, 35, of Aurora, were born in Israel. Doron is a high school teacher in Peel and an outstanding gymnast. Varda is in facilities planning at York University. The Kernermans have three grandchildren.

Janet Klein Slavin, program co-ordinator, takes over Kernerman's duties at the end of January.

Civilized nations must respond

Tucked away in the nether pages of the daily newspapers on the first day of the new year was a sparsely-written report concerning a number of political rallies held that day throughout Iran to mark what that country's clerical leaders, twenty years ago, dubbed Jerusalem Day.

Millions of Iranians gathered in various city squares on Jan. 1 to hear their leaders call for the destruction of Israel. We can only imagine the frenzy and the froth of the cheering hordes in Tehran when they heard Ayatollah Ali Khameini say, in a factual and moral inversion more piquant than any in Alice's wonderland, "the presence of Israel is a very big threat to regional nations and states." In line with his lurid logic, Khameini offered his people the following geo-political, religious strategem: "the annihilation and destruction of the Zionist state."

To reinforce his leader's point, the speaker of Iran's parliament proposed a variation on Khameini's murderous theme. "Jerusalem must be liberated and Israel wiped off the map of the world."

These sinister propositions must not be left unchallenged. It is no longer acceptable, if indeed it ever was, to politely dismiss these statements as meaningless, harmless, domestic panderings. They are incitement of the most dangerous kind, openly urging killing and slaughtering. They are evil and should, at last, be recognized as such by the civilized nations of the world. Even as Israel and its neighbours are painstakingly striving to find a way of living peacefully side by side, the leaders of Iran are brazenly striving to gorge them all in blood.

The leaders of Iran must be held accountable for such incitement. There must be consequences in the international arena that attach to the deliberate and dangerous sowing of such harrowing hatred.

The first place where those consequences should be felt is at the United Nations. Members of the United Nations, including Iran, expressly submit to the UN Charter, a binding multilateral treaty establishing rights and duties, when they sit, as sovereign state members, in the General Assembly. The Charter enunciates very precise purposes and principles that are to govern the behaviours of member states towards each other and towards the organization.

The very first purpose of the organization is to "maintain peace and security." How, therefore, can Iran's overt behaviour toward Israel be reconciled with its binding obligations under the charter?

Article 2.4 is quite explicit: "All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations."

We call on the government of Canada to be at the forefront of the civilized international response to the malicious, hateful incitement by the Iranian regime toward the Jewish state. The consequences could range from censure in the UN to expulsion.

Canada has never recoiled at the UN from publicly berating Israel. How, in good conscience, in this situation, can it refrain from berating Iran?

CAPTIVE IN IRAN

The government of Iran still holds the following members of the Jewish community as prisoners. Each is a universe of life and existence unto his own. And each has a name. Let us not forget them.

Another view of new historians

Jeffrey Roberts expressed shock and disgust (CJN, Dec. 16) at what I thought was Morton Weinfeld's straightforward reporting about the "new historians" movement in Israeli history ("What is truth?" CJN, Nov. 25). He recommended reading Prof. Ephraim Karsh's 1997 book, Fabricating Israeli History, to learn the truth.

Having not read that book, I was grateful for Roberts' reference and read it. I was very disturbed by the book and Karsh's many accusations of false and misleading scholarship. However, without specialized knowledge, I found it hard to judge these statements on the evidence presented. So I also read reviews of the book by distinguished academics who are not part of the new historians' group. I wish Roberts had done the same, and I think that CJN should not leave their readers with his one-sided comments. .

For example, a lengthy review essay of Karsh's book by Ian K. Lustick, chair of political science, University of Pennsylvania, was published in London's highly respected International Institute for Strategic Studies journal, Survival, in fall 1997. There was also a revealing exchange of letters between Karsh and Lustick published in the next issue (winter 1997-98). Both the 11-page essay and the letters clearly set out Karsh's own many errors, misleading comments and underlying purpose in vilifying Prof. Benny Morris and his colleagues.

Don't give up Golan

Israel's present leaders are more frightening than her enemies. By telling Israelis to submit to Syria's demands or face more Scud missiles, Ehud Barak is working for Syria and against his own people. Hafez al-Assad certainly isn't telling Syrians to make peace with Israel or face nuclear bombardment. Would Winston Churchill be revered if he had told Britons to submit to Hitler or be bombed? Of course not. Churchill is revered for having told Britons to never ever, ever give up.

Reportedly, James Carvell and associates, master propagandists behind the Barak election victory, are now working for Barak to demoralize and confuse Israelis into giving up the Golan. This is a truly serious matter. Without the Golan, Israel would become an unwanted protectorate of the United States with virtually no capacity for self-defence.

Now that the dust has settled over the recent attempted speaking tour by British hatemonger David Icke, I would like to offer a word of thanks on behalf of the Green party of Ontario to all those with whom we worked to oppose this individual's message of division and intolerance.

Our concern with David Icke stems not only from the need for solidarity with the Jewish and other communities whom he attacks, but also because Icke attempts to gain credence for his beliefs from his prior association with the British Green party, without ever mentioning that they have disowned Icke and condemned his writings in no uncertain terms.

The level of success that was achieved in informing the public and venues of the true nature of David Icke's paranoid conspiracy theories was due in large part to the tireless efforts of Rubin Friedman and Karen Mock of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights, Daniel Fine and Bernie Farber of the Canadian Jewish Congress, and Stacia Benovitch of Vaad Ha'Ir, Ottawa.

It was extremely encouraging to note that, apart from Hart House Theatre, every venue that was contacted made the decision that they were not willing to be a platform for David Icke or his followers. Most impressive was the Bronson Centre in Ottawa and the Order of Grey Nuns who run it. In a remarkable display of common sense, they always try to find out a little more about anyone who approaches them to rent space, and after a minimum of inquiry on their own, they quickly decided they weren't interested in having Icke as a guest in their facility.

Support for teachers lacking

I have mixed feelings about the pressure being placed on the Ontario government regarding funding for non-Catholic private schools. The protests concerning inequity should have taken place when the government extended full funding to the Catholic education system a decade or more ago. No religious voice came to the rescue of Ontario public high school teachers except for the Anglican bishop of Toronto. Where was everyone else at that time?

Database of Orthodox singles

A number of Toronto women have come together to assist in formulating a solution to the apparently ever-increasing problem of Orthodox Jewish adults continuing to remain single for far too long a period.

They have formed a non-profit community-wide group entitled Sasson V'Simcha which now has been inaugurated expressly to help singles find a mate. Thus, Sasson V'Simcha encapsulates the total Orthodox community and carries the endorsement of every Orthodox synagogue in the city.

Corresponding efforts are being carried out in Israel, New York, Chicago, and other large Jewish centres. These organizations network with one another.

Orthodox rebbitzens, together with other founding members, laboured together to develop a twofold approach to solving this serious dilemma. Their objectives are first to develop a database of observant singles, and second to provide a meeting place for people to put forward singles to others on an unidentified basis, which through the combination of brainstorming and networking may result in the making of suitable shidduchim.

A similar effort carried out by Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist rabbanim and rebbitzens would be most worthy of them.

Perspectives

Modern Orthodoxy in Israel

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

Modern Orthodoxy in Israel is full of life and change today. There are several troubling signs, but also many interesting and positive developments.

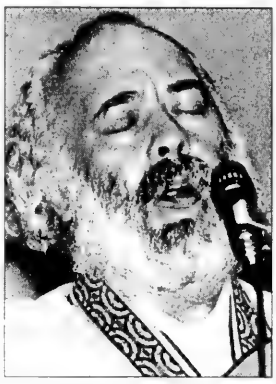
The most obvious problem for the community is the loss of political clout. The National Religious Party (NRP) used to be a significant political force in Israel. At a time when many small parties in Israel are growing in size because of changes in the electoral system, the NRP has fewer members of the Knesset.

Rabbi Michael Melchoir

Many religious institutions that used to be controlled by the NRP are now under the control of other parties which are haredi. At the same time, the NRP has lost support from the left. The party's major agenda item for the last few years – its opposition to a Palestinian state and to a "land-for-peace" approach to the Golan Heights or West Bank–has become less and less popular in Israeli society.

Aside from political losses, many people speak about the phenomenon of young modern religious Jews "falling away from the path" – either pursuing a haredi lifestyle or, more often, a secular one. This problem exists, but no one knows its true extent.

There is no proof that the drop-out rate is larger now than before or, even, that the drop-out rate is greater than the rate of people who become more religious. But the community does feel that it has a problem, and is troubled by it.



Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach's influence is still being felt.

Few stories are, however, written about all the positive aspects of modern Orthodoxy in Israel today. They are many, and some of them are very surprising.

A case in point is the Third Lavi Conference which took place in Jerusalem this fall. The first Lavi Conference was held almost 30 years ago, at Kibbutz Lavi, a religious kibbutz near Tiberias. At that time, members of the religious kibbutz movement felt, perhaps correctly, that they were the only "modern Orthodox" Jews in Israel and that they needed to invite American rabbis to come meet with them to discuss issues of modernity and Judaism.

By 1998, the situation had changed radically. Israeli Jews participated in a vibrant conference at Kibbutz Lavi, discussing issues of concern to the modern Orthodox community of Israel. In 1999, the demand for attendance at the conference was so great that the conference was held at the Hyatt Hotel in Jerusalem where many of the sessions were attended by more than 600 people.

The conference was no longer sponsored solely by the religious kibbutz movement; Bar Ilan University, the Israeli branch of Yeshiva University and a few lesser-known Israeli groups (none of them political) were also sponsors.

The level of discourse was surprisingly high, as was the level of candour and introspection. Clearly a group of people had gathered together who felt sufficiently self-confident to criticize themselves and to wonder publicly about issues of modernity and Orthodoxy.

Many speakers questioned whether it is still possible to make Talmud the central subject of study in a high-school yeshiva. One rabbi, who teaches at a yeshiva of the religious kibbutz movement, gave an impassioned and controversial speech encouraging the teaching of biblical criticism (generally considered unthinkable in the Orthodox world). He argued that biblical criticism offers much of value to modern religious Jews.

Women's issues were the subject of many speeches and many discussions. A number of community rabbis, especially those from religious kibbutzim, talked with pride about small innovations in their communities – like giving women Torah scrolls to dance with on Simchat Torah. Not all the participants were of one mind on this issue either.

In a controversial talk titled, How to Tell the Difference Between Constructing a Tabernacle and Constructing a Golden Calf, Rabbi Yuval Cherlow tried to lay out relatively narrow ground rules for innovations that would be tolerable in modern Orthodoxy. The reaction from the audience to his suggestions – especially to the idea that one can and should measure the motivations of those proposing changes – led to some sharp exchanges.

Despite the stereotype of "hot headed Israelis," the people at this conference disagreed with each other respectfully. And there were people there with serious disagreements. The conference included members of the political right, like Rabbi Cherlow, and Hanan Porat, a former MK and a founder of Gush Emunim; and members of the political left, like rabbis Yehudah Amital and Michael Melchior, leaders of the religious "peace" party, Meimad. There were men and women of almost all ages and of almost all professions (with a high percentage of Jewish educators).

To me, the most impressive part of the conference was that many panels included some professional rabbis and some professional academics, usually professors of Jewish Studies. Although they did not always agree, the two groups respected each other and neither one saw itself as the only legitimate authority on the question of the future of modern Orthodoxy.

This type of friendly conversation and dialogue on such a large scale between religious academics and professional rabbis would be almost unthinkable in Canada or the United States today. And the rabbis who attended this conference were not peripheral to Israeli society. Aside from Rabbi Israel Meir Lau, the Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel–who visited the conference – many spiritual leaders of communities and heads of yeshivot were also present.

The Lavi conference is not the only sign of a resurgent, thoughtful and self-critical modern Orthodoxy in Israel today. Probably the greatest recent change in modern Orthodox circles is the creation of options within modern Orthodoxy.

Yeshivot are now advertising for students and are highlighting the differences between them. You can find ads for a yeshiva that stresses the environment, one that stresses the sciences, one that stresses the arts, and one that stresses "spiritualism." A recent ad also listed "well-varied social activities" as a central characteristic of the yeshiva. The curricula of modern Orthodox yeshivot have also changed radically.

Traditionally, beyond the elementary school level, yeshiva curricula consisted of Talmud and more Talmud. Today there is much more of an emphasis on the study of Bible than perhaps ever before in the history of yeshivot. Jewish Philosophy is also an important subject of study. One post-high school hesder yeshiva (i.e. a yeshiva that combines army service with yeshiva study) now teaches the philosophy of such non-Orthodox thinkers as Martin Buber, Franz Rosenzweig and Hermann Cohen.

• Changes in the education of women are even more startling. As recently as 10 years ago there was hardly one place in Israel where religious women beyond high-school age could study Talmud, aside from in a university course. (There too, they were not overly welcome.) Today, there are dozens of top-notch institutions where Israeli women can study all aspects of Jewish studies, including intensive study of Talmud and rabbinic literature, within a modern religious environment.

Such institutional frameworks hardly exist in Canada. A small, important step was taken in that direction in Toronto this year by the founders of Mekorot. But in Israel, many people in modern Orthodox circles joke that young men want to decrease the amount of Talmud that they learn, while young women and secular Jews are the ones who are pressing for more Talmud study.

Innovation in Israel has also affected synagogue services. Religious services that highlight spiritualism are being tried in Canada here and there, but in Israel they are widespread and readily available. Just 10 years ago, "spiritualism" was a word almost never heard in modern Orthodox circles.

Today "Carlebach"-style services, "Bratslav"-style services, and various other new styles with rhythmic chanting or extensive community singing abound. Beside the "standard" synagogues where Friday night services take 40 or 45 minutes, there are many Orthodox services that last two and three times that long.

There is a common misconception that "Orthodox feminism" is an issue only in the Diaspora and that all Israeli Orthodox women are satisfied with traditional roles and gender distinctions. The facts do not bear out that claim. Even in the controversial area of ritual, modern Orthodox Jews in Israel are innovating more than their Canadian counterparts.

As mentioned earlier, in a growing number of Israeli Orthodox synagogues women dance with Torah scrolls on Simchat Torah. In Canada this is still seen almost everywhere as "un-Orthodox" behaviour. In Canada it is very rare to find an Orthodox synagogue where a woman is allowed to deliver a d'var Torah (short sermon) during the service, a custom which is gradually becoming more accepted in Israeli modern Orthodox circles.

But even those innovations pale beside the new models of Orthodox services that are being tried now, especially in south Jerusalem. Once a month on Saturday morning a minyan meets where the service is entirely Orthodox and the men and the women are separated by a mechitzah, yet the Torah service is egalitarian.

Rabbi Yehuda Amital

And now a new minyan meets in Jerusalem every Friday night where again men and women sit separated by a mechitzah, and men lead the Minchah and Ma'ariv services, but women are the cantors for the Kabalat Shabbat service.

The organizers of those services and the hundreds of Jews who pray there (including a number of Orthodox rabbis) are convinced that Orthodox Halachah permits such innovations.

Vibrant Reform and Conservative synagogues that are totally egalitarian are available in the neighbourhood. Yet those who attend the new modern Orthodox minyanim are not interested in Conservative and Reform models. They want to pray in what they consider an Orthodox synagogue, where the envelope is being pushed to find new ways to make women comfortable.

Modern Orthodoxy is alive and creative in Israel today. It is striving in exciting ways to remain both modern and Orthodox.

Opinions

A museum appeals to you

The Museum of Jewish Heritage is the latest addition to the landscape of Holocaust remembrance. Built on the most dramatic spot of New York City – at the very southern tip, opposite the Statue of Liberty – it introduces a new note. Emphasizing the living as well as the dead, it shows how those who reached North America enriched the world in a thousand ways, and thereby puts the loss of the millions who perished into a special light.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Their loss is in fact incalculable. That, to me, is the real message of this museum.

My wife and I were privileged to donate some of our memorabilia to the museum, and we are always delighted when we hear from friends who have visited New York and say they have seen our modest contributions exhibited.

Which leads me to the purpose of this article. I would like to give readers the opportunity to contribute something they might have lying in their attic or other half-forgotten spot.

The museum appeals especially to rabbis, organizational leaders and archivists, but not to them alone. The museum is seeking donations of original artifacts and documents for its permanent collection from which our exhibitions and other educational programs are drawn. Please help tell your personal and communal stories by donating artifacts to the museum. Among the requests are the following items:

- prayer books, Haggadot and the like, published in Canada;
- material relating to life-cycle events celebrated in the synagogue, 1880-1930;
- chevrah kadishah certificates;
- smichah ordination certificates, 1880-1930;
- testimonials given to rabbis, 1880-1930;
- objects with dedicatory inscriptions, 1880-1930;

I can testify from personal experience that giving items to a museum has a very special dimension of pleasure. Knowing that others will enjoy what you have cherished in the seclusion of your house, engenders a unique feeling of satisfaction. Do it if you can; you'll like it.

This article will appear shortly after my brother Walter's yahrzeit. Although he died double-chai years ago, his memory is still bright for all who knew him. The new millennium is poorer for the absence of this special rabbi.

The joys of shul-hopping

We went to New York City in November determined to sample the nearly infinite variety of synagogues available on any Shabbat to the residents of the Big Apple. What we found was a rich and varied Judaism.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Our first Shabbat was spent in Riverdale with a young family from the "Avi Weiss shul." I am sure that it has another name, but it will forever be known in our household as the Avi Weiss shul, since it is his charisma that infuses the congregation with a special aura.

That Shabbat was devoted to welcoming Yachad, a group of disabled adults who come together to celebrate their Jewishness. Along with the regular congregation, they danced and sang at the Kabalat Shabbat service and on Saturday morning, when there was standing room only.

The warmth and welcome of that congregation was a testimony to the inclusiveness promoted by Rabbi Weiss. Not only did the Yachad members join in the service and singing but one of them gave a d'var Torah.

We went home to Shabbat lunch with a refreshed appreciation of the ways that Jews can celebrate together, where the will exists – and a regret that so many of our institutions cannot learn the lesson of inclusiveness the Avi Weiss congregation teaches.

The second Saturday was spent at the home of one of our non-Jewish relatives. Still remembering the high we had attained at the Avi Weiss shul, we enjoyed a quieter Shabbat with our family, who eagerly celebrated with us. Their favourite part of the day is the havdalah service, which we all sing (or hum). With this family we experience our Judaism in a deep, if different, fashion.

We were on the Upper West Side of New York on the last weekend. There is such an embarrassment of riches there that we had a difficult time choosing. Our choice for Friday night was the Carlebach Shul.

When we were on our first sabbatical in Israel, we had lived across the street from Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, and we remembered the Shabbat crowds that would visit his apartment.

His shul is now led by "Rabbi Sammy" (Intrator). Kabalat Shabbat lasted for nearly two hours of ecstatic davening and dancing, with Rabbi Sammy's energy reaching out to all.

Rabbi Carlebach's magical melodies are the bedrock of the service. Imagine our surprise when the rabbi, without breaking his chant, inserted a d'var Torah into his singing.

At the dinner, which followed, we heard three more interpretations of the week's parshah. They were given by Ari Goldman, a former New York Times religion correspondent, Rabbi Joseph Telushkin, and his sister-in-law, Rabbi August. Rabbi Sammy introduced her with her title of rabbi. It was another example of inclusiveness and achdut.

Saturday morning we considered either the Lincoln Square synagogue made famous by Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, or B'nei Jeshurun, the large Conservative congregation on 86th Street. We chose the latter, having heard about their melodic worship (and we wanted to sit together for a change).

While their synagogue undergoes repairs the BJ has been meeting in a church. A huge banner covered the altar and declared, "How good it is for brothers to dwell together in peace." Two huge angels kept watch over us.

The congregational davening was magnificent, a musical instrument accompanying the voices of the rabbi, cantor and congregation. What a sound it was – rich, deep and tuneful. Carlebach niggunim were interspersed with other, less familiar but easily learned melodies.

There were several divrei Torah. They were given by the bat mitzvah; by a young man who had written a letter to Dinah, the rape victim of that week's parshah; and by a long-surviving person with AIDS who urged the congregation to participate in the campaign to conquer this 20th-century scourge.

We also learned that the BJ and the Carlebach shul had recently held a joint Shabbaton. If only we had been there to see these two congregations join together.

The service concluded with Ein Kelokeynu – sung in Hebrew and Spanish.

As Alice in Wonderland put it, these experiences "fill my head with ideas – I just don't know what they are." Not only had we heard wonderful davening, we had heard it in three very different venues.

A great man died this year – Dr. Joseph Burg. He was perhaps the last of his generation – a man deeply religious, learned in Judaism, and yet at ease with the world of secular learning.

He combined his life as a religious Jew with ethical standards few in public service achieve throughout the first 50 years of the State of Israel. Perhaps someone like Burg would have synthesized for us the special gifts of each of these congregations, being able to grasp the commonalties while celebrating the differences.

It will be well for Jewish life in the 21st century, if we can do so.

Israel Basic Laws are not suicide pact

I remember the occasion vividly: a group of Canadian judges and academics were visiting Israel to attend a conference on human rights organized by Irwin Cotler and the Canada-Israel Legal Co-operation Programme. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms was in its formative years while the Israeli Basic Laws on Human Dignity and Freedom and Freedom of Occupation were in their infancy.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Before the conference's formal sessions began, members of the Canadian delegation were hosted by the Supreme Court of Israel in the magnificent surroundings of the new Supreme Court Building in Jerusalem. After a tour of the building, the Canadian judges met with their Israeli counterparts to exchange information. The Canadian academics were invited to listen.

Justice Beverley McLachlin – soon to be our chief justice – described, with great emotion, the difficulties which the Court had encountered in attempting to balance the competing interests in deciding the Henry Morgentaler abortion case.

After she concluded, it was the turn of Justice Aharon Barak – now Israel's chief justice. He started: "I have a dream." He continued: "I have a dream and my dream is that one day abortion will be the most difficult issue facing our Court, as well."

I have never forgotten the poignancy of this exchange. It was the first thing that came to mind when I read Chief Justice Barak's judgment in the case of Hat'm Abu Zayda et al. vs. The State of Israel et al. (otherwise known as known as the General Security Service (GSS) Torture case).

Barak, speaking for the Court, held that the GSS had no legal authority to use interrogation methods involving physical force (for example, shaking, holding the individual in an uncomfortable position for a lengthy period of time, or depriving him of sleep.) The Court further asserted that this ruling even applied to the case of the so-called "walking time bombs" – when the situation is dire and lives are at stake.

Barak acknowledges the problem of terrorism. However, he concludes: "A democratic, freedom-loving society does not accept that investigators use any means for the purpose of uncovering the truth."

In Barak's opinion, the Shin Bet operatives have no greater power than any other police officers when it comes to interrogating suspects. Physical force, he says, can only be authorized by legislation if the legislation complies with the Basic Law on Human Dignity and Liberty – that is, any law must befit the values of the State of Israel, be enacted for a proper purpose and to no greater extent than is necessary.

The Justice Ministry has recently tried to find a legal compromise in the wake of the decision in this case. A special committee was asked to determine whether the Knesset should pass a law to allow physical pressure in certain extraordinary circumstances. The committee has reached a stalemate. Dan Meridor, the highly respected chair of the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Security Committee is opposed to the enactment of such a law. So is Minister of Justice Yossi Beilin. Their position, essentially, is that when it comes to torture there is no compromise possible, no middle-of-the-road position that can be adopted.

Apparently, Shin Bet will have to live with the decision and adjust its methods accordingly. This may be one of those "constitutional moments" wherein the centrality of the Basic Laws of the Israeli system of constitutional democracy is recognized and affirmed by the political actors.

The decision in this case – and the moral and ethical position espoused by Meridor, Beilin and others – seems intuitively correct, until one realizes the magnitude of the terrorist threat which confronts Israel daily.

As Barak himself notes: "The State of Israel has been engaged in an unceasing struggle for both its very existence and security…Terrorist organizations have established as their goal Israel's annihilation… These groups do not distinguish between civilian and military targets. They carry out terrorist attacks in which scores are murdered in public areas, public transportation, city squares and centres, theatres and coffee shops.

"They do not distinguish between men, women and children. They act out of cruelty and without mercy…Many attacks – including suicide bombings, attempts to detonate car bombs, kidnappings of citizens and soldiers, attempts to hijack buses, murders, the placing of explosives, etc. – were prevented due to the measures taken by authorities responsible for fighting the above described hostile terrorist activities on a daily basis…We are aware of the harsh reality of terrorism in which we are, at times, immersed. Our apprehension that this decision will hamper the ability to properly deal with terrorists and terrorism, disturbs us."

This frightening description of the terrorist danger brings to mind the pronouncement of the U.S. Supreme Court: "The Constitution [and here I would add, the Basic Laws or, for that matter, the charter] is not a suicide pact."

A constitution becomes abstract and meaningless if it sanctifies only the rights of the dead. I have a dream. My dream is that Barak's dream will come true. Unfortunately, it hasn't yet.

The Kirshner File

The greatest Jews of the millennium

Last week, I published a partial list of the 100 most influential/and or greatest Jews of the millennium. I now conclude the survey, which, of course, is subjective.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Albert Einstein – Formulated theory of relativity and explained photoelectric effect. Urged President Franklin Roosevelt to investigate the possible military use of atomic energy, a suggestion which ushered in the age of the A-bomb.

Karl Marx – Chief theoretician of Marxism, whose analysis of capitalism and the class struggle in Das Kapital and Communist Manifesto influenced generations of left-wing revolutionaries.

Leon Trotsky (Bronstein) – One of the masterminds of the Bolshevik Revolution and the Red Army.

Sigmund Freud – Founder of psychoanalysis. Outlined his ideas in tomes like The Interpretation of Dreams and Three Contributions to the Sexual Theory.

Vladimir Zworkin – Physicist, whose work in electronics at Radio Corporation of America paved the way for the invention of television.

Nathan Meyer Rothschild – Coin dealer who founded a legendary banking dynasty which swayed empires and helped industrialize Europe.

Benjamin Disraeli – First British prime minister of Jewish ancestry. Instrumental in the purchase of the Suez Canal, which exerted a profound effect on British diplomacy, particularly in the Middle East.

Jonas Salk – Microbiologist who developed the vaccine against polio.

Judah Benjamin – As the Confederacy's secretary of war and secretary of state, he may have been the most prominent Jew in 19th-century America.

Alfred Dreyfus – The unjustly maligned army officer whose trials and tribulations rocked France to its very foundations.

Henry Kissinger – The first Jew to be appointed U.S. secretary of state, he had a profound impact on Vietnam, China and the Middle East.

Jacob Schiff – A pre-eminent American Jewish communal leader for 40 years. Battled anti-Semitism and fought for social justice.

Sir Moses Montefiore – British philanthropist who launched campaigns on behalf of Jewish rights in Europe and the Middle East.

David Ricardo – Economist whose theories on labour, wages and international trade were very influential.

Judah Touro – Businessman who established the tradition of Jewish philanthropy in the United States.

Julius Rosenwald – Merchant who turned Sears, Roebuck and Company into a powerhouse.

Steven Spielberg – His box office-busting films – Schindler's List, Jurassic Park, etc. – have left an indelible cultural impression.

Irving Berlin – Greatest songwriter in history (God Bless America, White Christmas, etc.).

George Gershwin – Composer whose symphonies (Rhapsody in Blue and An American in Paris) defined an era.

Oscar Hammerstein II – Lyricist/librettist whose Broadway shows – South Pacific, The Sound of Music, Oklahoma! – cast a spell on millions, and still does.

Felix Mendelssohn – Major force in classical music whose works – A Midsummer Night's Dream, The Scottish Symphony, etc – enchant and enthrall.

Albert Einstein

Gustav Mahler – Outstanding composer /conductor (Song of the Earth and Songs of a Wayfarer).

Abraham Goldfaden – First important Yiddish playwright, father of the Yiddish theatre and creator of such memorable characters as Kuni Lemel and Bobbe Yakhne.

Heinrich Heine – Poet and essayist whose Book of Songs, which contains the famous Lorelei, animates German culture.

Saul Bellow – His novels – Herzog, Mr. Sammler's Planet, Seize the Day – are marked by technical flair and intellectual gravity.

Franz Kafka – Fictional writer who conjured up a surrealistic universe in angst-filled novels (The Trial, The Castle and Metamorphosis).

J.D. Salinger – In novels and short story collections ranging from The Catcher in the Rye to Franny and Zooey, he distills the essence of a conformist society whose characters are entangled in a welter of restrictions and banalities.

Arthur Miller – Playwright whose plays – Death of a Salesman and An Enemy of the People – were in the forefront of forging the brave new world of American theatre.

Harry Houdini – Illustrious magician whose ingenious escapes set high sleight-of-hand standards for his successors.

Paul Julius Von Reuter – Founded the Reuters agency, which revolutionized the dissemination of fast-breaking news.

Joseph Pulitzer – His New York World was the prototype of the modern American daily newspaper. He funded the Pulitzer Prizes for excellence in journalism and literature.

Adolph Ochs – The printer's apprentice who bought The New York Times and transformed it into what is arguably the world's finest daily.

Abraham Cahan – As editor of the Jewish Daily Forward, he facilitated the integration of new Jewish immigrants into American society.

Walter Winchell – Racy gossip columnist who elevated celebrity into an enduring passion-cum-obsession.

Hank Greenberg – The best Jewish baseball player.

Sid Luckman – The best Jewish football player.

Runners-up...Emma Lazarus, whose iconic words grace the Statue of Liberty; A.M. Klein, the Canadian poet; Joseph Heller, Bernard Malamud, Philip Roth, Elie Wiesel, Primo Levi, Lillian Hellman and Norman Mailer, the writers; Hannah Arendt, the philosopher; Vladimir Horowitz, the pianist; Menachem Schneerson, the Chabad rabbi; Marc Chagall, the painter; Moshe Safdie, the architect; David Dubinsky, the unionist; Franz Boas, the anthropologist; Calvin Klein, the fashion designer; David Sarnoff, the radio pioneer; Gertrude Elion, the biochemist; Al Jolson, the entertainer; Sandy Koufax, the baseball pitcher; Sergei Eisenstein, the film director; and Max Reinhardt, the theatre director; Mark Spitz, the Olympic swimming champion.

Rabbinic Reflections

Mitzvah of tfillin

By RABBI AVRAHAM PLOTKIN

One of the most celebrated commandments, mentioned no less than four times in the Torah, is the mitzvah of tfillin. The Torah introduces it in this week's portion: "And it shall be a sign upon your arm and an ornament between your eyes."

Upon examining the Hebrew text, the commentaries point out that there seems to be an extra letter "hey" attached to the word "yadchah" (your hand). This redundancy is explained in the Talmud based on the oral tradition that the work is really composed of two words, "yad kahoh," the weaker arm. The law therefore dictates that if one writes with the right arm, they place the tfillin on the left arm and vice versa.

The mitzvah of wrapping the "weaker arm" with the tfillin can also be used as an analogy in our approach to weaker segments of the community.

It teaches us not to neglect and reject those less involved, but rather to embrace them and surround them with the warmth and holiness of our traditions.

To counter the rise of intermarriage and assimilation in North America, there has been, over the past few decades, a proliferation of Jewish outreach organizations dedicated to bringing peripheral Jews back to their roots and heritage.

Established Jewish organizations and synagogues have also changed their approach and are doing outreach work.

While there are many notable and successful outreach organizations, the pioneers are no doubt the Lubavitch, who this week mark a significant date in the history of the movement – the 50th anniversary of the passing of the previous Lubavitcher rebbe, Rabbi Yosef Schneerson, and the appointment of his successor, Rabbi Menachem Schneerson, the Rebbe.

George Rohr, a leading philanthropist and lay leader, once visited the Rebbe and proudly notified him of a new outreach program that was initiated in his shul: "Thank God, this Rosh Hashanah we set up a beginners' service in our shul and had 120 Jews with no Jewish background participate!"

Happy to see Rohr, the Rebbe had a broad smile on his face, but when Rohr spoke, the Rebbe's face dropped. Rohr searched his words for anything he might have said to upset the Rebbe.

"What?" said the Rebbe.

Rohr repeated: "A hundred and twenty Jews with no Jewish background." And then he realized that what he had said was wrong, but it was too late. The Rebbe was already speaking.

"No Jewish background?" asked the Rebbe. "Go and tell those Jews that they are all children of Avraham, Yitzchak and Yaakov."

This is the first important lesson in successful outreach work. We must recognize that every Jew, regardless of affiliation, has that background and the pintele Yid (divine spark) that waits to be ignited.

Jews returning to their faith are not discovering something new and external. They are discovering something very old and on the inside. It is a journey of self-discovery. It is something familiar. Introducing Jews to their faith is merely restoring to them what is rightfully theirs.

This has been the secret of the Lubavitch approach – having faith in every Jew and in the power to return. To celebrate the 50th anniversary of Lubavitch outreach, Lubavitch is launching a new campaign called Change the World... One Mitzvah at a Time, beginning this week with the International Week of Friendship and Kindness.

What better way to mark such a significant milestone than with the mitzvah of love, the very essence of the organization and the Rebbe's legacy?

Jewish news on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

One of the pleasures of the Internet is the ability to surf the newspapers of the world and learn about communities far away.

Today I start my look at Jewish newspapers of the Net with American and Canadian community papers.

Not surprisingly, some of the most interesting and established Web news comes out of New York. The Jewish Week is the largest newspaper of its kind in the United States [http://www.thejewishweek.com/] Theirs is a large, well organized site with news, commentary, a discussion forum, and even a quiz. The Jewish Post of New York online focuses on local and global issues [http://www.jewishpost.com/]. A sampling: From Pharaoh to Milosevic: Evil and the Use of Force; Joint New York State And Israel Collaboration New Hope For The Mentally Ill; and Shawn Green: Baseball's Rising Jewish Superstar.

The venerable Forward, founded in 1897, has made it into the 21st century with a respectable English-language Web presence [http://www.forward.com/]. It's also worth a visit, since it has one of the best set of links to Jewish media sites on the Net.

Also online, the Jewish Press, which calls itself "the largest Orthodox Anglo-Jewish weekly" [http://www.thejewishpress.com/].

Rather than giving us shorter news pieces, the Atlanta Jewish Times only posts its feature-length cover stories on its Web site – anything from a profile of CNN's Wolf Blitzer to a piece on Judaism and sex titled "Is Viagra Kosher?" [http://www.atljewishtimes.com/].

Similarly, the Detroit Jewish News concentrates on longer thought-provoking stories, such as Balancing Act: Teaching evolution in a Jewish context; and Making Peace With The Past: German Jewish life springs anew from the dustbin of communism and Nazism [http://www.detroitjewishnews.com/].

In its current issue, the Baltimore Jewish Times examines whether American Jews really could handle Middle East peace. And then it looks at a very local issue. A school policy which awards students with perfect attendance has been modified to allow students to observe religious holidays and still qualify for the award [http://www.jewish times.com/].

Boston's Jewish Advocate is able to draw upon local talent such as Alan Dershowitz (how the men running for president use "religious pandering" to get votes) and from Leonard Fein, director of the Commission on Social Action of Reform Judaism (The Law of Return as Affirmative Action) [http://www.neponset.com/jewish_advocate/index.htm].

Some other American papers worth a look include the Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles [http://www.jewishjournal.com/], New Jersey Jewish News [http://www.njjewishnews.com/], the Jewish News of Greater Phoenix and the Kansas City Jewish Chronicle [http://www.sunpublications.com/jchron/jchron.html] and the Jewish Bulletin of Northern California, which covers the region around San Francisco [http://www.jewishsf.com/].

North of the border, The Canadian Jewish News maintains a Web site which is worth your time [http://www.cjnews.com]. In addition to an archives of selected articles, The CJN is one of the few Jewish sites updated daily; so you can read up on international news before the articles make their way into the hardcopy edition [http://www.cjnews.com/international/].

Next week, how to find the best writing if you don't have time to do a lot of surfing – plus a couple of Jewish news sites with a lot of attitude.

Jewish Life

School funding fairness

By KEITH LANDY

Guest Voices

Bruce Elman, in his Dec. 6, 1999 column, questions whether the November ruling of the United Nations Human Rights Commission on public funding to religious schools is really good for the Jews.

The UN body, of course, decided that Ontario's policy of funding only students attending Roman Catholic separate schools is clearly discriminatory, and because of that, Canada, as a signatory to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, is in violation of its treaty commitments.

Elman essentially warns us to be careful about what we ask for, as we might not be very happy with the result if our wishes were granted. In fact, his arguments are largely based on several myths, which I will address in turn.

The first myth concerns the "spectre" (his word) of an onslaught of parents sending their children to a wide range of religious schools if government funding were provided and thereby "leading to greater costs to the government and undercutting the viability of the public school system." Because of this, Elman states, "it is not surprising that Ontario seems opposed to following the UN ruling." The facts however are totally at odds with both Elman's projections and his logic.

In British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Quebec and yes, even Alberta (where Elman lives), nothing of this sort has actually happened. Where funding is provided, the floodgates have not opened, and the vast majority of parents continue to send their children to public schools. Their public systems of education continue to flourish, and there has been no evidence of detrimental effects to the public systems resulting from such funding of religious schools.

However, what if Elman's prediction were actually to materialize? What if many more children were to register in government funded religious schools? Would this, as Elman suggests, lead to "greater costs to the government?" Not really. The monies previously spent on educating these children in the public school system would simply be transferred to the religious schools. In financial terms it would be basically a "wash."

Now to myth number 2, which I believe is no less serious an error. Here Elman projects another worst case scenario. What if governments, in return for providing funding to religious schools, began to unduly interfere in the running of these schools – i.e. wanting to shape their curriculum, determine staffing priorities?

Again, has this actually happened in the many jurisdictions that presently provide public funding to religious schools? No it hasn't, and there is no evidence suggesting that it might. Government involvement has been strictly limited to making sure that the secular part of the education provided by religious schools meet overall government education guidelines. No government that I can imagine in this country, would be foolish enough to intrude into the religious component.

On other matters, Elman and I will simply have to agree to disagree. For example in a rather summary manner, he posits that the "UN decision is effectively unenforceable" and "nor can the federal government require them [Ontario] to follow the UN decision." Mr. Elman, not I, is the esteemed constitutional lawyer but when Canada – with the approval of all 10 provinces – signs onto an international treaty (the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights), there is a clear imperative for this country to live up to its treaty commitments. To do anything less, I believe, would seriously undermine Canada's commitment to both human rights norms and international law.

Our Jewish community has every reason to demand that our Jewish day schools receive equal funding to that provided to the Roman Catholics in Ontario schools. Simple fairness – as the UN body ruled – demands that, and no less.

Assessing the Pope

Pope John Paul II:
A Jewish Assessment.

Books
Bernard Baskin

A recent biography of the Pope, Witness to Hope, by George Weigel, provides an opportunity to say something about him from a Jewish point of view.

In 1942, the Pope was a parish priest in Krakow, Poland. Helen and Moses Hiller and their only child, Shachne, were confined to the Krakow ghetto. The murder of Polish Jews had then reached its zenith. The Hillers read the ominous signs of death and wanted to save their son. After careful and arduous searching, they contacted a Roman Catholic couple who had no children and who lived in a small town on the Aryan side of the ghetto. The Hillers convinced them to care for Shachne and to conceal him.

Soon thereafter, the Hillers, like most Krakow Jews, went to their deaths. The devout Roman Catholic couple, upon learning of the death of Shachne's parents, decided to have him baptized. They approached the priest, who later became Pope John Paul II, and told him the secret of Shachne's true Jewish identity and of the Hillers' last request – that the child should be told of his Jewish origins and returned to the Jewish people if the parents should die.

The priest said it would not be proper to baptize the child and refused to perform the ceremony. This was an act of fairness and humanity and probably uncommon in a country like Poland, where hatred of Jews was fierce.

This was just one indication of Pope John Paul's respect for the integrity of the Jewish people, which has marked his priesthood. He has spoken out repeatedly against the scourge of anti-Semitism and has decried the centuries of oppression and tyranny that Jews have had to endure.

He has referred to Judaism as a living not a dead legacy and has stressed that God's covenant with the Jews was never retracted. He has spoken eloquently about the close ties of Christianity and Judaism and called us "brothers in faith."

Indeed, Pope John Paul II has been a good friend of the Jewish people. But even our best friends do things that displease us and the Pope has done several in the last few years.

Besides meeting Kurt Waldheim, then president of Austria, an unrepentant Nazi, and praising him as a man of peace, the Pope received the PLO leader, Yasser Arafat. He gave his papal embrace to a terrorist, to one responsible for maiming and murdering many innocent men, women, and children.

He also beatified Edith Stein, a German Jew who adopted Catholicism, became a Carmelite nun, and died at Auschwitz. He called her a martyr for the Catholic faith.

The reality is that Stein was not killed because she was Catholic. She was murdered because she was, in the eyes of the Nazis, still a Jew. To imply that she became a martyr for any other reason than her Jewish birth is patently offensive to Jews.

The Pope has often issued statements of sympathy for the Jewish people who suffered the horrors of the Holocaust. However, the Pope has not yet faced up to the role of the Church before Vatican II in fostering hatred of the Jew.

He has not admitted the Vatican's guilt in keeping silent during the years of the Holocaust. Though many individual members of the Protestant and Catholic clergy did speak out and even sheltered Jewish people, the official Roman Catholic Church did little, if anything, to save Jews.

The Holocaust is inextricably tied up with the religious past of Christianity. The Pope needs to force the Catholic Church into an honest confrontation with its own history.

Perhaps, above all, the Vatican, at the Pope's direction, has granted full diplomatic recognition to Israel and intends to visit the country after the New Year. Such a gesture would lend an official imprimatur to Israel's existence and improve relations with Christians around the world.

Alex Beder, 93, (right) at his birthday party where 1,000 needy people were fed, is seen with his dinner co-sponsor, his longtime friend, Captain John Letnik.

Senior shares his good fortune with those 'less fortunate'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Alex Beder, a retired furrier and builder/developer, celebrated his 90th birthday, by hosting a party for 1,000 needy individuals.

He said he wanted to share his good fortune in life with those less fortunate than himself. So the nonagenarian contacted his longtime friend Captain John Letnik, owner of Captain John's Harbour Boat Restaurant at the foot of Yonge Street.

"I asked him if we could prepare 1,000 meals for the homeless and hungry people of Toronto." Beder says.

That was four years ago. Beder, a man of many interests and accomplishments, sits back in his Bathurst Street apartment and speaks of plans for next year's annual dinner.

Beder is well known for his courage to speak out against injustice, his work for the underprivileged and his philanthropic efforts.

A plaque on his wall, signed by Mayor Mel Lastman and the members of the Toronto City Council, congratulates Beder and Captain John's "on the occasion of your Annual Dinner to Feed the Hungry."

Not only does Beder co-sponsor the dinner with Letnik, he is also there to serve and share his special brand of optimism and cheer.

He says that keeping an active mind and body has led to his longevity. He has a multitude of interests – high on his list are politics and sports.

His family has been active at Holy Blossom Temple for more than 80 years and he is involved with the temple's Out of the Cold program for the homeless.

Born in London, England in 1906, he arrived in Canada with his mother Bertha, brother Monte and sister Estelle in 1914.

His father, Benjamin, a native of Vilnius, Lithuania, had settled in Toronto two years earlier with his oldest son Edward. The family settled into a house on Gerrard Street, east of Broadview Avenue near his father's fur shop.

At 14, Beder left Humberside Collegiate to work in the family fur business, replacing his brother Edward who had entered the Canadian Armed Forces.

With a glint in his eye, he says he attended the collegiate's centennial celebration a few years ago. He was feted as the oldest former student in attendance and presented with a sculpture of the school.

Shortly after leaving school, Beder discovered Oliphant's Gym in the Markham and Bloor street area. From that day on, he became fanatic about fitness, he says.

He did weightlifting, played football, hockey and competitive baseball as well as amateur boxing. Today, he still works out with weights, on his stationary bike and does his calisthenics.

When he was in his 30s, he joined the Queen's Own Rifles reserve during World War II after the Royal Canadian Air Force turned him down.

While in the fur business, Beder met and married Terry Swackhammer, a top model for Creed's, Simpson's, Eaton's and other high-fashion clothiers. Terry, who died a year ago, was president of the Women's Division of Variety Club and active in Hadassah-WIZO.

In 1997, Beder wrote and published his life story titled, My Ninety Years: Confessions of a 14-year-old High School Dropout. Always keenly interested in the State of Israel, he dedicated his publication to "the Brave Soldiers of Israel who always stand ready to defend democracy in the only democratic country in the Middle East."

The proceeds from his autobiography have been donated to The Association for the Soldiers of Israel. In his honour, an activity room at Mashavei Saade at an Israel defence base south of Beersheva has been dedicated to him for his generosity to the Israeli soldiers.

Scrap books cover his table with clippings and documents about his outspoken criticism of those who have wronged others. He tells of Lou Limmer, who is Jewish, who played first base in 1955 for the Leafs. He hit 33 home runs and was voted the most popular player on the team.

When Jack Kent Cooke traded Limmer, Alex tore up his season's tickets and let Cooke know that he was "disgusted" with Cooke's biased attack on Limmer. Beder says he still retains a friendship with Limmer.

When Shawn Green came to the Leafs and was about to be traded, Beder says he reminded the club of the mistake they made many years before. He says he pleaded with them to keep Green, who later became a star right fielder for the Blue Jays.

He says he received an autographed baseball from Green – he now plays for Los Angeles – , with a note of appreciation for Beder's having faith in him.

When asked about a message for younger people, Beder sighs and says, "My motto is DGU – Don't give up." And that is the message he gives the 1,000 needy people who come to celebrate his birthday each year.

Emile Aufgang and his sister Lea Shumacher and two of her grandchildren Yoav and Aliza, are seen cutting the 50th anniversary cake at Aufgang Travel's recent 50th anniversary celebration.

Aufgangs mark 50 years in the travel business

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — To celebrate the 50th anniversary of Aufgang Travel, Emile Aufgang, son of the founder, hosted a celebration for staff, clients, friends and industry representatives.

In 1949, Isaac Wolf Aufgang opened Aufgang Travel, and photos that record the history of the mid-sized family business adorn the walls.

Lea Shumacher, who worked in the business with her father and brother Emile for many years, was on hand to greet their guests.

Born in Warsaw, Isaac, with his wife Esther and daughter Lea, left Poland in the 1930s and established a travel agency in Paris where Emile was born. Recognizing the danger, the family left France for Spain just as the war broke out and in 1942, they again fled to Portugal.

The Aufgangs were one of the few families to come to Canada during the war years. Arriving in Toronto in 1944, Isaac worked for Dominion Travel. Five years later, he opened his College Street location where the business consisted mainly of steamship ticket sales to immigrants from Europe.

Emile recalls helping out in the travel agency as a child on College Street where the family lived above the store. When he graduated from the University of Toronto, he joined his father and sister in the business.

That was a time, Emile says, when Miami Beach and the Catskills were in great demand.

The family business was moved to Bathurst Street in 1969, a year before Isaac died and Emile took over the presidency. "On the one hand," he says, "it has gone by so quickly. On the other, it has been a long time to be in the industry."

He spoke to The CJN about the major changes created by the technology that have taken place in the industry.

"We used to prepare airline tickets, cruise line tickets and other materials for groups of hundreds of participants by hand. Today we can create them by electronic computer in a very short time."

Emile's first large tour group was arranged for 306 people for the Canadian Zionist Federation to Israel in 1970.

"We have since gone on to do hundreds of major Jewish and non-Jewish group trips and family tours for people across Canada and throughout North America."

Emile points to some unusual photos of a group on the Majestic Imperial Train which travels from Budapest to Vienna. He chartered four coaches on the refurbished Austro-Hungarian monarchy's train where the group enjoyed the ambience and had a royal lunch.

"We enjoyed the magnificent splendor of yesteryear."

JF&CS tackles myths surrounding child abuse

'We're not immune. We have the same social problems as any other community': Howard Hurwitz

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

According to a persistent myth, child abuse doesn't occur within the Jewish community.

The truth, however, is a different story.

By its very existence, Jewish Family and Child Service of Toronto attests to the fact that child abuse – along with a generous array of other domestic problems – exists within our community and cannot easily be swept under a rug.

Special Feature

A multiservice agency with a large suite of offices in the Lipa Green Building, JF&CS has an annual budget of $9 million and more than 100 full-time employees. It devotes its resources exclusively to dealing with child abuse, woman abuse, poverty and other social ills within the 175 000-strong Jewish population of Toronto and York Region.

"We're not immune," acknowledges Howard Hurwitz, director of children's services for JF&CS. "We have the same social problems as any other community in Toronto."

As proof, Hurwitz reports that the agency, which boasts 37 workers who deliver child welfare services, currently has 85 children under its care. These youngsters live in foster homes, group homes and institutions such as hospitals, jails and detention facilities.

"These are children who, for one reason or another, can't live with their biological families," says Hurwitz. "All these kids have specialized treatment needs. Many have some kind of psychiatric, behavioural, emotional or developmental problem."

Child abuse has been a special priority for the agency's social workers at least since its current executive director, Gordon Wolfe, began his tenure in 1981. That year, JF&CS won official status from the province as a children's aid society on a par with the Metropolitan Toronto Children's Aid Society and the Catholic Children's Aid Society.

"We fought very hard for that status, because we felt that Jewish kids that had to be taken from their homes had to be put into Jewish foster homes," Wolfe says.

"We felt strongly that there had to be a Jewish agency doing that, with a Jewish thrust."

Eric Kirsh, supervisor of special resources, oversees the team of four social workers who investigate the roughly 450 incidents of child abuse reported to the JF&CS each year.

That's an average of nine new cases a week, most often called in by teachers, family members, neighbours, doctors, rabbis and strangers to the families involved.

"If the call comes from a school, a principal or guidance counsellor might say that a certain child came in this morning upset and crying," Kirsh says. "When the teacher asked what was wrong, he explained that the family had an argument and that he was hit, perhaps dragged to the car, or punched, something that would account for his distress."

Because of its role as a children's aid society, JF&CS is legally obliged to investigate every report of child abuse and neglect it receives, according to the protocol laid down by the provincial Child and Family Services Act. The agency has the authority to remove a child from a home, and will exercise that authority when it considers the child is at risk of injury.

"It's not an arbitrary decision. It's not one person going in and making a slapdash decision."

After a suspected incident of child abuse or neglect is reported, a JF&CS social worker may contact the police immediately. Alternately, in cases where the injuries seem slight or unsubstantiated, the social worker may arrange to interview the child at school, usually notifying the parents simultaneously.

"In some circumstances, we determine that it might be better to see the child without the parents' knowledge," says Kirsh. "Sometimes we can get a more accurate description from the child if the child hasn't spoken to the parents beforehand. We need to get the information in as untainted a way as possible.

Afterwards, JF&CS investigators will talk to parents, then witnesses. Even so, in many cases they are unable to verify that any abuse or neglect actually occurred.

"We may determine that something happened, but we just don't know what."

The agency has a policy of zero tolerance towards corporeal punishment, but many parents don't live by this standard and readily admit that they hit their children.

According to Kirsh, parents who are faced with an accusation of abuse commonly retort: "Yeah, I whacked my kid – so what? Didn't your father ever hit you?" The tone often conveys deep annoyance at the perceived intrusion into their private affairs.

In most cases, Kirsh says, JF&CS investigators determine that an adult used excessive physical force to discipline a child. "That's the usual pattern. The parent was having a bad day. It's rare that we find that parents intentionally hurt their children…

"We like to work with the parents as closely as possible. We're respectful of the struggle that they have to discipline their kids and get them to do what they want them to do."

In such cases, JF&CS social workers meet with family members, both together and apart, and convince them to attend the agency's classes in parenting skills or anger management.

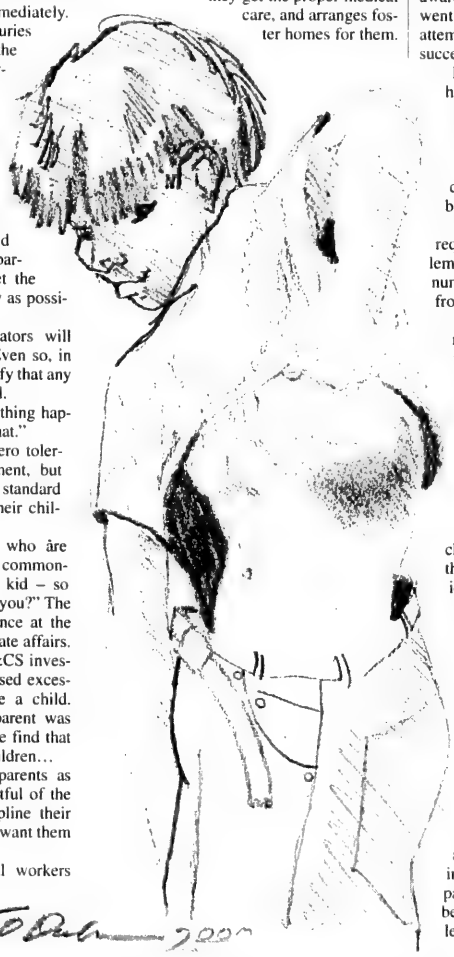
Among Toronto-area social service agencies, the JF&CS is a leader in the number and quality of preventative programs it offers meant to reduce the frequency of child abuse and other domestic problems. The agency offers classes in its own premises as well as in schoolroom settings so as to reduce or eliminate the onus some people may feel in attending them.

"We feel that by providing preventative services to the community, it may reduce the number of crises that we have to respond to," says Hurwitz. "We place a very strong emphasis on providing treatment and preventing child abuse from recurring, and that makes us different from other children's aid societies. We believe strongly that the prevention services are essential in keeping kids safe."

The agency also offers counselling, play therapy and other follow-up treatment services for children and their families.

More extreme cases of physical abuse and neglect demand a higher level of intervention, sometimes involving the courts. The toughest cases involve kids with serious bruises and broken bones.

Through its authority as a children's aid society, JF&CS removes the children from their homes almost immediately, ensures they get the proper medical care, and arranges foster homes for them.



Sometimes, JF&CS arranges supervision orders and imposes conditions on families to ensure children are not mistreated. Agency social workers may pay regular visits to home or school, by appointment or by surprise, and arrange regular reports on a given child's well-being from doctors, nurses or school personnel.

JF&CS case files are bulging with sad and shocking stories. A mother locks her young children into a car on a hot summer day and goes to a gambling casino. A social worker visits a home and finds unwashed kids in dirty clothes and diapers, no food in the refrigerator or on the shelves, and other evidence of serious neglect.

Then there was the "mother with mental health problems" who was attempting to raise four children, all between the ages of three and nine, in "very dirty, unkempt circumstances." A single parent, she engaged in unspecified "occult practices." Her two dogs were not housetrained and had fouled up the small apartment. A concerned public health worker called JF&CS after the mother refused to let her in for several weeks. A suspicious neighbour called as well.

"We took it upon ourselves to visit the home," says Kirsh. "We removed the children almost immediately, and the court awarded us interim custody. The children went into foster homes. The mother made an attempt to rehabilitate herself, but without success."

In cases involving parents with mental health problems, the agency will intervene to insure that the adults receive medical treatment so that the children, whenever possible, can stay at home.

"Our goal is always to try to work as co-operatively with families as possible," Kirsh says.

JF&CS workers are sometimes required to solve uniquely difficult problems where they must mediate among numerous parties in order to rescue a child from potential harm.

Such was the case when the agency received an urgent call from a hospital that the parents of a three-year-old girl were refusing to allow medical treatment that doctors were urging as vitally necessary.

The girl had a serious digestive problem that required an immediate surgical procedure. It was a medical-ethical dilemma that needed quick action.

"According to the hospital, the child's medical situation was so serious that she could die if she didn't get medical treatment," Hurwitz recalls. "We met with the parents, who told us that they wanted to try a non-intrusive, non-surgical approach. They felt that surgery carried too much risk."

Since the parents were Orthodox, JF&CS social workers turned to the rabbi of the religious community to which they belonged. "The rabbi was very helpful in having the parents co-operate with us," says Hurwitz. "The child got the surgery and the case was closed."

Sometimes, JF&CS workers act to alleviate difficult situations. For instance, they were called in to assist the parents of a 10-year-old girl with serious behavioural and developmental problems.

"The parents felt they were at the end of their rope and unable to provide care for her any longer," Hurwitz says. "They were totally frustrated by her behaviour and felt they needed a period of separation from her." The agency arranged for the child to go into a group home on weekends for several months, thus giving the parents at least part of the respite they needed.

Wiesenthal Centre gets new Canadian rep

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After two months on the job at the Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC), Toronto lawyer Leo Adler admits he's learned more about the organization's operations and global scope than he did in 10 years of working behind the scenes.

He was impressed and somewhat surprised by the international organization's quick response to the presence in England of Nazi henchman Konrad Kalejs and he was quick to join the effort to urge the Australian government to prosecute the Latvia-born war criminal.

He's also learned another valuable lesson: that his one-year trial run as director of national policy for the Canadian office of the SWC seems to be working just fine.

Adler, 52, is busy trying to juggle a full-time criminal law practice with the position he took over in mid-November. Adler replaces Sol Littman, who has retired after serving as Canadian representative of the SWC.

Littman's duties have been divided between Adler and Melissa Cohen, who has been named national director of development with responsibility for fund-raising and programming.

Adler and Cohen have hit the ground running at the centre, which is best known for Holocaust remembrance, pursuing war criminals and attacking hatemongers. Already they have scheduled two programs for February – one a speaking engagement by former racist skinhead T.J. Lauden, the other a meeting with two dozen representatives of Internet service providers to discuss hate on the Web.

It's all part of his agenda of continuing Littman's work and pushing the SWC to be more involved in anti-racist education, Adler said.

"The centre's image has always been of going after the Nazis," he said. "But as we come to the 21st century and we see that war crimes are still occurring in new contexts in different countries, the centre is very active in pursuing that as well.

"The Simon Wiesenthal Centre is devoted to creating an understanding between groups; so if you understand what is prejudice and bigotry, you'll appreciate why we have to fight these things."

Adler said the Canadian office will continue to track hate sites on the Internet, educate police officers in locating Cyber hate and develop education programs that promote tolerance.

With the growing use of the Internet by racist groups, the centre is urging service providers and professional associations that represent them to address the issue. Adler cites the example of www.sol-littman.com, a Web "hatesite" that uses the name of the former SWC spokesperson without his permission.

"It's not a censorship issue," Adler said. "It's a registration issue. If you have registration, you'll know who is offering sites that are hateful."

Adler said he plans to expand the centre's ties to other communities that may also be the target of racists. Adler maintains that last summer's "brouhaha over Chinese immigrants comes down to questions of tolerance." The SWC believes it must speak out whenever any group is the subject of discrimination, not only when Jews are attacked, he said.

Adler also plans to broaden the organization's membership and get current members more involved, particularly those who live outside Toronto. By drawing on local members' expertise and knowledge, the centre can be better informed on events across Canada while relying on local members to represent the organization outside Toronto, he said.

Adler began his association with the SWC about 10 years ago when he was approached by lawyer John Rosen and asked to join the centre's legal committee. Over the course of years, the group met occasionally and responded to Littman's inquiries about hot legal issues.

As part of his duties, Adler met with then Conservative justice minister Kim Campbell to discuss war crimes prosecutions. He was not impressed with the minister's lack of enthusiasm for the issue.

"I got the feeling I was being politely stonewalled," he said. The centre's offer to name potential witnesses was shunted aside with the argument that relying on witnesses provided by the SWC might weaken the prosecution.

Adler, an experienced defence lawyer, rejects that view. "It's not like we're making it up. We're just giving leads to potential evidence... It's no different than calling Crimestoppers," he said.

Adler, the child of Holocaust survivors, was raised with his own family's wartime stories and their description of survival. His grandfather, Leo, was one of the first victims of the Holocaust. In 1939, shortly after the German invasion of Poland, he was forced to dig his own grave and then shot. For Adler, joining an organization that emphasized Holocaust remembrance, was an easy decision.

Leo Adler

Born in Kulimbach, Germany, after the war, Adler grew up in Israel and Montreal.

SOLAR BOUNTY

Solar energy may some day bring the world unprecedented health and prosperity. Pursuing innovative uses of inexhaustible, pollution-free energy on a massive scale, scientists are hard at work to end dependence on fossil fuels. ❦ The Weizmann Institute of Science in sun-drenched Israel is an acknowledged leader in research to harness, store and transport the energy of the sun. Current path-breaking research projects in its remarkable solar furnace and solar tower facilities include: the "solar energy pipeline" to collect solar energy in one place and ship it to another; the efficient production of hydrogen for use as a clean fuel; solar-powered lasers and gas turbines to generate electricity. ❦ Solar energy research will benefit everyone. It deserves enthusiastic support.

For more than 50 years, we have marshaled support for the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel. Its 2,500 scientists, engineers and scientists-in-training are fully engaged in a remarkable agenda of over 1,000 research projects to fight disease and hunger, create new technologies, protect the environment, and harness alternative sources of energy.

Srul Irving Glick to be honored

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — About 10 years ago, Srul Irving Glick requested to see a piece of his own music at the Canadian Music Centre.

When he expressed surprise at the thick sheaf that was brought to him, he was told by the custodian, "Didn't you know? Glick is one of Canada's most prolific composers."

Glick hadn't actually realized that his many years of composing had translated into that much music, he said in an interview.

The Toronto native will be honoured for his 30 years of service to Beth Tikvah Synagogue and his recent 65th birthday, in a sold-out cabaret-style event this Saturday night at the shul. More than 500 people are expected to attend.

Glick is the synagogue's composer-in-residence and director of its two choirs.

Under his guidance, Beth Tikvah has won two Solomon Schechter awards from the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism for the best musical program for a synagogue in North America.

Glick has won several awards for the Judaic component of his work, among them the J.I. Segal Award for his contribution to Jewish music in Canada and the Kavod Award of the Cantors Assembly of America.

In 1994, he was appointed a Member of the Order of Canada.

A full-time music producer at the CBC from 1962 to 1986 (with the exception of a sabbatical year spent in England and Israel), Glick studied composition in Paris, France, after completing two music degrees at the University of Toronto.

Srul Glick

He taught theory and composition at the Royal Conservatory of Music and York University, and continues to teach composition privately.

He recalls his time at the CBC as "very exciting... We felt like we were building music in Canada...and that we were giving artists a chance to make their names and their careers."

Glick's work, which runs the gamut from klezmer to chamber music, is performed regularly on at least five continents.

Recently he and his wife Sara were in New York to hear his Sing Unto the Lord a New Song performed at Lincoln Center by the Harlem Boys Choir and the New York Philharmonic.

But it's as much for Glick's personal attributes as his musical expertise that he's being honoured at Beth Tikvah, as evidenced by warm tributes from colleagues, family and friends, to be shown in a specially prepared video.

Russian-born oboist Senia Trubashnik, for example, recalls the time he and his wife had rented a basement apartment in Etobicoke, and Glick took them and their daughter, Anna, now the cantor at Temple Emanu-El, into his more centrally located home for almost three months.

"He's a very caring individual," Martin Hoffman, a longtime choir member, told The CJN. "He's gentle, knowledgeable. He's always amazed me. He's so good at what he does."

His choir work over the past 30 years has been a labour of love, Glick said. "I remember in earlier years, I always was so shocked after we'd finished Yom Kippur services that we hadn't brought Mashiach because of the intensity and the beauty of the singing."

Glick wasn't encouraged to pursue a career in music, although his father, a native of Kishinev, was a cantor. As a teenager, Glick sang in his father's choir on the High Holy Days.

He began to study piano only at age 15, when he decided he wanted to be a composer. A football quarterback and baseball team pitcher, he gave up sports at the behest of his piano teacher, who told him his arms and hands were too "tight."

His father, David, and his mother, Ida, were "somewhat disappointed" by his ambition, he recalls.

"Composers didn't make a living in those days. They still don't," he laughed. His salary from CBC paid for his composing time, he noted.

Professionally, his biggest challenge has been his quest to write music "at the deepest depth I can reach."

The father of three grown children, he also sees his compositions as his offspring. He is currently working on nine commissions.

A more personal challenge is to overcome a recent cancer recurrence. His "hard-won" philosophy is to "live each day to make it as special and as beautiful and as rich and as important as you possibly can."

Start the new year off with a peanut

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Peanuts and peanut butter are among North America's most popular foods.

Some brands of peanut butter do not contain artificial sweeteners, colors or preservatives. Some brands add sweeteners and salt for taste, as well as a stabilizer for freshness and to keep the oil from separating. Old-fashioned or natural peanut butter does not have the stabilizer, so the oil will separate and should be stirred back in before using. Most people don't realize that peanut butter does not need to be refrigerated and is a naturally low sodium food.

Peanuts and peanut butter contain mostly unsaturated fat, which has been shown to lower LDL-cholesterol levels in your blood. In fact, recent studies indicate that frequent consumption of peanuts and nuts, as part of a healthy diet may actually lower the risk of heart attack. Peanuts are also natural cholesterol as well as a good source of folic acid.

However, peanut allergies are on the rise. According to Dr. Hugh Sampson, a pediatrician at Johns Hopkins School of Medicine in Baltimore, it is because children are given peanut butter sandwiches or crackers as quick meal substitutes before their immune systems have a chance to develop.

He goes on to say that children under the age of three are most likely to have food sensitivities, probably because their immune systems can't tolerate a lot of new substances. Children with a family history of food allergies should not be given peanuts or peanut products until the age of three for this reason.

The following recipes are a great mixture of sweet and savory so that everyone can enjoy the great taste of a food that I guarantee will still be popular in the year 3000.

PEANUT BUTTER BANANA MUFFINS

1¼ cups all purpose flour
¼ cup toasted wheat germ
1 tsp baking soda
½ tsp salt
1 cup mashed ripe bananas (about 3 medium)
½ cup honey
½ cup chunky peanut butter
2 large eggs
⅓ cup vegetable oil
¼ cup (packed) dark brown sugar
1 tsp vanilla extract

Preheat oven to 400. Line 12 muffin cups with muffin papers. Stir the flour, wheat germ, baking soda and salt in small bowl to blend. Set the mixture aside. Using electric mixer beat the bananas, honey, peanut butter, eggs, oil, sugar and vanilla in medium bowl to blend. Beat in flour mixture. Divide the batter among muffin cups. Bake muffins until tester inserted into centre comes out clean, about 20 minutes. Transfer muffins to rack; cool. Makes 12 muffins.

DELUXE PEANUT BUTTER CUPS

¼ cup plus 2 tbsp powdered sugar
¼ cup sour cream
2 tbsp whipping cream
¼ tsp vanilla extract
¾ cup chunky peanut butter (do not use fresh ground or old-fashioned style)
1¼ pounds bittersweet (not unsweetened) or semisweet chocolate, chopped
¾ cup roasted unsalted peanuts, separated in halves

Mix the powdered sugar, sour cream, whipping cream and vanilla in a medium bowl. Stir in the chunky peanut butter, mix well. Cover and refrigerate until well chilled. (Can be prepared 1 day ahead.)

Place 36 foil mini muffin cups (measuring 2 inches in diameter at widest point) on 2 cookie sheets. Melt chocolate (in a top of double boiler over simmering water or microwave) stirring until smooth. Drop 1 tsp chocolate into each mini muffin cup. Rotating each cup, spread chocolate 3/4 inch up insides of cups with small knife. Refrigerate until chocolate is set, about 20 minutes.

Peanut butter's just great for salads or soups

Drop 1 rounded tsp peanut butter mixture into each cup. Flatten slightly with back of spoon. Remelt chocolate. Spoon enough chocolate (about 1 tsp) into each cup to cover filling completely. Sprinkle each peanut butter cup with several peanut halves. Dip fork into remaining melted chocolate. Carefully wave from side to side over peanuts to create decorative pattern. Refrigerate until chocolate is set, about 20 minutes.

Divide peanut butter cups among airtight tins. (Can be prepared up to 4 days ahead and refrigerated.) Makes 36.

FROZEN PEANUT BUTTER PIE

1½ cups powdered sugar
1 cup creamy peanut butter
1 8-ounce package cream cheese, room temperature
½ tsp vanilla extract
1 cup chilled whipping cream
1 purchased 6-oz chocolate cookie pie crust

Blend the powdered sugar, peanut butter, cream cheese and vanilla in processor until smooth, occasionally scraping down sides of work bowl. Transfer the mixture to large bowl. Beat cream in medium bowl to soft peaks. Fold cream into peanut butter mixture in 2 additions. Spoon peanut butter filling into crust and smooth top. Freeze pie until filling is firm, at least 3 hours. (Can be prepared 1 week ahead. Cover and keep frozen. Let stand room temperature 20 minutes before serving.) Serves 8.

CHINESE NOODLE AND CHICKEN OR TURKEY SALAD

2 lb linguine
¼ cup oriental sesame oil
2-2½-lb roasted chickens, skinned, boned, shredded or 12 cups cooked turkey
4 bunches green onions, sliced
2 bunches fresh cilantro, chopped
4 jalapeño chilies, seeded, minced
1½ lb snow peas, stringed, thinly sliced lengthwise

Dressing

1 cup soy sauce
½ cup creamy peanut butter (do not use old-fashioned style or freshly ground)
½ cup rice vinegar
½ cup oriental sesame oil
2 tbsp sugar
Napa cabbage leaves

Cook linguine in large pot of boiling salted water until just tender but still firm to bite. Drain. Rinse with cold water to cool; drain well. Transfer to large bowl. Add the sesame oil to the noodles; toss to blend. Mix in chicken or turkey, onions, cilantro and chilies. Set aside to cool. Cook snow peas in medium saucepan of boiling salted water until just crisp-tender, about 1 minute. Drain. Rinse with cold water to cool; drain well. Mix into salad.

Combine soy sauce, peanut butter, vinegar, sesame oil and sugar in processor; blend until smooth. Pour dressing over salad and mix with hands to blend well. (Can be prepared 1 day ahead. Cover and refrigerate.) Line large platter with Napa cabbage leaves. Mound salad over and serve. Serves 20.

COLD SESAME NOODLES

2 tbsp smooth peanut butter
2½ tbsp sesame oil
1½ tbsp soy sauce
¼ cup water
2 tsp minced garlic
2 tsp minced peeled fresh ginger
2 tsp rice vinegar
1 tsp sugar
¼ tsp Asian chili paste or dried hot red pepper flakes
¼ lb thin egg noodles or spaghetti
3 tbsp minced scallion

In a blender blend together the peanut butter, 2 tbsp of the sesame oil, the soy sauce, the water, the garlic, the ginger, the vinegar, the sugar, the chili paste, and a pinch of salt and set aside when blended. In a kettle of salted boiling water cook the noodles until they are al dente, drain them in a colander, and rinse them well under cold water. Drain the noodles well, in a bowl toss them with the remaining ½ tbsp sesame oil, and mound them on a platter. Drizzle the noodles with the sesame mixture and sprinkle them with the scallion. Serves 4 as a main dish and 8 as a first course.

PEANUT SUPER SLAW

6 tbsp rice vinegar
6 tbsp vegetable oil
5 tbsp creamy peanut butter
3 tbsp soy sauce
3 tbsp (packed) brown sugar
2 tbsp minced peeled fresh ginger
1½ tbsp minced garlic

5 cups thinly sliced green cabbage
2 cups thinly sliced red cabbage
2 large red or yellow bell peppers, cut into matchstick-size strips
2 medium carrots, peeled, cut into matchstick-size strips
8 large green onions, cut into matchstick-size strips
½ cup chopped fresh cilantro

Whisk rice vinegar, oil, peanut butter, soy sauce, ginger, garlic and brown sugar in small bowl to blend. (Dressing can be made 1 day ahead. Cover and chill. Let stand at room temperature 30 minutes before continuing.) Combine remaining ingredients in large bowl. Add dressing and toss to coat. Season with salt and pepper and serve. Serves 4 to 6.

CURRIED PEANUT SOUP

1 tbsp peanut oil
1 medium onion, halved, sliced
3 garlic cloves, minced
3 tbsp curry powder
4 cups (or more) chicken stock or canned broth
½ cup rice
3 medium carrots, peeled, sliced
½ cup creamy peanut butter (do not use old-fashioned style or freshly ground)
1½ tsp. sugar
finely chopped green onions
chopped fresh cilantro

Heat oil in heavy large saucepan over medium-high heat. Add onion, garlic and curry powder and sauté until onion is translucent, about 6 minutes. Add 4 cups stock and bring to boil. Stir in rice and carrots. Reduce heat and simmer until rice is very tender, stirring occasionally, about 20 minutes. Puree half of soup in blender or processor with peanut butter. Return puree to saucepan. (Can be prepared 1 day ahead. Cover and refrigerate.) Stir soup until heated through, thinning with more stock if desired; do not boil. Mix in sugar. Ladle soup into bowls. Sprinkle with green onions and cilantro. Serves 4.

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The University of Toronto will have a new Jewish student centre, thanks to the generosity of two local families.

In honour of Mel and Pedie Wolfond, their three sons – Henry, Chad and Greg– are donating $1 million towards the new centre for Jewish campus life.

As well, the families of Saul and Henry Koschitzky will be donating $250,000 to the centre, which will be located at the corner of Harbord and Huron streets.

The wide variety of programming downtown shows that the new centre will be well used, said Zac Kaye, director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS).

"The reality is there are four-and-a-half thousand students at U of T. It's a prominent university and there's an increasing number of Jewish students."

The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, a joint project of UJA Federation and Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, will be open to all Jewish groups on campus, from the AEII fraternity to the Student Association of Jewish Engineers.

"It will be a centre used by students from a wide variety of backgrounds – a space where they will be comfortable. It won't be owned by any particular group," Kaye said.

At about 4,000 square feet the centre, which he anticipates will have three storeys, will be "modest," he said.

It will have two apartments with a bed and a washroom for overnight stays following Shabbat programs and a resource centre that will house a small Jewish library and a bank of computers, he noted.

While a synagogue will not be built, there will be a "spiritual space" for praying which will be non-denominational, Kaye said.

Students can expect a kitchen, staff offices, a reception area and an outdoor courtyard with space for a sukkah, he added.

While construction has not yet begun, Kaye is hoping for a ground breaking in spring and completion of the building in the fall.

This will not be the first centre for Jewish students at U of T. From about 1947 to 1990, U of T had Hillel House, which had been owned by B'nai Brith Canada. In the early '90s, B'nai Brith had to sell the building due to financial cutbacks.

Since the demise of U of T's Hillel House, Jewish students have gathered informally at various places within University College. U of T's Jewish Student Union is currently housed in the basement of the college.

The design for the new building has not yet been chosen. A joint JCS and UJA Federation committee will decide between four architects' designs next month.

Architects were asked to design a building which would "exude being Jewish and being Jewish on campus," Kaye said.

"I think the design will send a message of Jewish pride."

Kaye also believes the new building will improve the quality of Jewish campus life, just as new Jewish student buildings have improved life on campuses across the United States.

"Those buildings became a catalyst for building Jewish pride, for building a sense of shared excitement about being Jewish on campus."

Princeton, Columbia, Harvard, Ohio State, and Northwestern universities are among the American universities that have recently built Jewish campus life centres, Kaye noted.

Kaye visited Princeton's Centre for Jewish Campus Life about three weeks ago during Hillel's professional staff conference.

While Princeton has a small Jewish population of about 700, the centre is "heavily trafficked and well used. It has become a focal point for Jewish life on campus," he said.

Shalem Center now accepting grad fellow applications

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Shalem Center in Jerusalem is accepting applications for Graduate Fellowship grants of $15,000, which will be awarded for study at the centre in 2000-2001.

The fellowships provide students in the social sciences and humanities with an opportunity to pursue guided independent study in diverse areas of Jewish national life.

The Shalem Center was founded in 1994 as an educational and research institution for Jewish social thought and Israeli public policy.

Fellows research theoretical and practical problems facing Israel and the Jewish people, and develop innovative approaches to solving the problems. They participate in weekly seminars, occasional symposiums and workshops on topics of interest.

Possible topics of research include Zionist theory and history, Jewish social thought and religion, political philosophy, Israeli foreign policy and other topics relevant to the public life of the Jewish nation.

Grants cover the period from Sept. 1, 2000 to Aug. 31, 2001. The program invites applications from candidates who have completed at least a bachelor's degree (or equivalent) in the humanities, social sciences or other relevant disciplines. Graduating seniors are invited to apply.

Requests for an application may be submitted by mail, telephone or e-mail to the North American or Israel offices of the Shalem Center. Completed applications must be postmarked no later than February 1, 2000.

For information, phone 202-887-1270, e-mail fellowship@shalem.org.il or write to The Shalem Center, 1140 Connecticut Ave., NW, Ste. 801, Washington, D.C. 20036.

Jewish quadruplets born to Montreal couple

"We strive to have a large family, as many children as God will give us, but I never thought they would come this way."

An ordained rabbi and a Grade 6 teacher at Yeshiva Gedola-Mercaz Hatorah for the past 13 years, Engel, 36, said he received "the biggest shock," when during a routine ultrasound scan during the 19th week of the pregnancy Chaya learned she was carrying four babies. They do not even know of twins in either of their families.

Just before she became pregnant, Chaya, 33, had been prescribed the drug Clomiphene to regulate her menstrual cycle. The drug slightly elevates the possibility of twins, said Solomon, but quadruplets are unheard of. This is not, the doctors stressed, a fertility drug.

From her 19th week, Chaya was confined to bed, Engel said. What might have been a difficult situation for a working man with six children aged three to 13, turned into a "communal simchah," he said.

"The Orthodox community rallied around us. They sent their daughters over to help, they sent meals, and this just enhanced our happiness."

The Engels have no immediate family in Montreal, where they have lived 13 years. Solomon is originally from Toronto, and Chaya is a New York native.

Two weeks before the birth, Chaya was admitted to the Jewish General after going into premature labour, Solomon said.

That condition was stabilized, but the pregnancy could not be extended any further than Jan. 5 because her cervix had dilated to four centimetres very rapidly that day.

The delivery itself was "completely uneventful," Solomon said.

Papageorgiou said he is quite confident that these are the first quads of the 21st century. Triplets were reported to have been born earlier in Sri Lanka, he said, and thinks it is highly likely that another multiple birth would have been made known.

Although hooked to tubes and monitors, the newborns were quite lively, with their tiny feet kicking.

The Engels have called their new daughter Sarah Leah after her maternal grandmother. The three boys will not be named until their brit milah, said their father, who expects that it will be delayed for two months.

Asked how they will manage, Engel said he makes "a modest salary," but they get by.

"We don't give our kids certain luxuries. They are clothed well and fed well. They get what they need. It's going to be tough, but God willing, we will be all right."

He said he is wondering, however, how the four new family members will find room in their 6½-room house.

He also said he's going to have to figure out which baby to go to first if they cry at the same time.

Engel made a special point of thanking the staff at the Jewish General for the superb care his children and wife have received. The hospital is designated by the Quebec government as a high-risk obstetrical referral centre for the entire province, and its neonatology ICU has consistently maintained one of the highest survival rates in babies weighing at little as 500 grams.

"Dr. Papageorgiou was available 24 hours. He came in the day and the night. I don't know when he sleeps," Engel said.

He also thanked the province of Quebec for quality of the health services it covers.

Lallier immigrated to Canada in 1951

the event or of even being there that day.

Lallier, who immigrated to Canada in 1951, did find a 1962 letter from another SS member, now a retired professor in Germany, referring to the event, which he handed over to German investigators.

Further evidence of the shooting was discovered by Lallier last fall when he went with a German television crew back to Terezin and the site of the killings. In archives there, they found an entry in the "black book" of a capo about the shooting of seven men in the ditch. Their names and the exact date are given.

Rambam also, separately, looked at this book. He said the book records that six of the seven were Jews and all were inmates of cell 46 of Thereisenstadt, as well as information about when they were born and something of their personal histories. The perpetrator or other circumstances of their deaths is not recorded.

Rambam said he also came across Red Cross records of the deaths.

Rambam confronted Viel in Germany last October. "He denied any involvement in the shooting, saying 'They tried before and failed. They will fail again,'" of the attempt to bring him to justice.

To see Viel go free would be a personal blow to Lallier, who feels his professional career came to a "dishonourable" end because he made his SS past so public. He said he would not have stopped teaching part time if the Concordia administration had given him a choice.

Some of his former colleagues have turned their back on him, and even friends question the wisdom of his decision.

On the other hand, he is heartened by the sincerity of today's Germans to own up to their history. After his story was aired in Germany last November, Lallier said he heard from a large number of Germans that he did the right thing and that Viel should be vigorously pursued.

Lallier said he was moved by "conscience" to testify against Viel and has no regrets. "I'm much more at peace. I sleep better," he said. "I have tried to redeem these Jewish victims to the best of my ability."

He does admit to a disillusion. "If Viel is let go, this will be another moment in my life that has shown that the system of human interaction is far from moral."

Lallier never hid his wartime experience from Canadian officials, and believes he was accepted as a citizen in 1957 "without any problems" because he worked for the International Refugee Organization in Europe after the war.

Rambam urges anyone with information related to the Viel case to phone him in New York at 212 - 969-0286 or by fax at 212 - 858-5720.

Coast to Coast

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Winter break is over and it is time to return to the task of demystifying the obscure and untangling the doublespeak that has characterized federal politics since politicians first stole the idea of spin from our dreidels!

While not all Ottawa regulars have returned from their R & R (unlike your faithful scribe), there is no shortage of examples from which to choose.

First we look to Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy. In a standoff between Indian authorities and a band of terrorists holding a planeload of hostages, Axworthy urged India to make concessions so that the crisis could be resolved without further bloodshed.

It has taken the civilized world almost forty years to arrive at a firm consensus rejecting any negotiations with terrorists. It took Lloyd only 40 seconds to turn that consensus upside down.

It did not take long for Axworthy to be "reined in," and within hours retractions and clarifications were spinning through the air. But in a brilliant stroke of management, all of a sudden, Axworthy began appearing in a variety of media taking credit for having introduced the concept of "human security" – the leitmotif that has long served as the basis for the Clinton and Blair Doctrines. This 21-year veteran of Parliament successfully managed to dodge accountability for breaching what has become a sacrosanct principle in the war against terrorism and claim responsibility for the dominant theme that characterizes current thinking in international relations in one fell swoop.

Not to be outdone, "Manning's minions" were busy trying to contain the growing pressure for a Reform Party leadership review. Manning pinned his future on the United Alternative gambit that would have seen a full merger between his Reform party and the feisty remnants of the Progressive Conservatives. The initiative failed and now, party stalwarts want Preston to be accountable for having distracted the Reform movement from its primary task.

Recognizing that after 12 years a leadership review may be inevitable, Manning's apostles are now promoting the call for the review as their idea. Its purpose, the spin goes, is to give Reform grassroots an opportunity to demonstrate unequivocal support in their Founding Father.

James Carvell would be proud of both!

MONTREAL — B'nai Brith is seeking intervener status in a court appeal by three neo-Nazis.

The neo-Nazis are appealing the sentences they received which were extended because their crimes were motivated by racial hatred.

The organization wants to participate in the case in order to argue that a lower court judge was right when he decided that the violent assaults the neo-Nazis committed were motivated by racism. The judge gave them sentences beyond what those convictions normally carry.

What makes this case less than clearcut is that the victims were not of a different race, but appear to have been targeted because they were members of an anti-racist group.

The Crown prosecutor did not agree with the judge that the crimes were motivated by hate.

A crime committed against individuals because they oppose racism is worse than someone, for example, attacking a Jew because he is Jewish, said B'nai Brith lawyer, Steven Slimovitch, because the former has repercussions at a societal level.

Whether the anti-racists are of the same race as their aggressors is irrelevant, Slimovitch said.

"Targeting members of a group because of their anti-racism ideology is racism, and the consequences are worse because attacking them does not just affect Joe it affects all Joes, if you will," he said.

In June, 1998, the three appellants and at least three other members of their neo-Nazi group entered the Flip Side bar, an establishment frequented mainly by members of SHARP (Skinheads Against Racial Prejudice). The neo-Nazis were armed with pipes, police sticks, claw-hammers, Mace and pepper spray, with which they attacked everyone present – at least six people, including three young women.

Quebec Court Justice Gilles Cadieux ruled last October that the attack was premeditated and that "prejudice or hate founded on racism" was an aggravating factor. They were victimized because they did not share the same racist philosophy as the neo-Nazis, Cadieux said.

Quebec court ruled that attack was premeditated

Cadieux cited Criminal Code section 718.2, an amendment passed by the House of Commons in 1995 as Bill C-41, which provides for longer sentences for hate-motivated crimes. Besides race, ethnic/national origin and religion, this section equally protects against hate crime based on such categories as age, sex, language and mental status.

"Although everyone retains his freedom of thought and his freedom of expression, and I would add the freedom to maintain or to stagnate in one's prejudices if they want, this freedom must not transpose itself into violent actions undermining the security of the collectivity," he wrote.

Cadieux also wrote that 718.2 "obliges" the court to take into account racism as an aggravating factor.

B'nai Brith agrees.

Slimovitch, chair of the legal committee of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, said, if granted intervener status, the league will argue that the crime was, in fact, a racist-motivated hate crime, as defined by 718.2.

"We agree with the judge's interpretation of what the legislators' intention was when section 718.2 of the Criminal Code was introduced," he said in a statement. "In this regard, then, the judge was right to take into consideration the aggravating circumstances of the case, which are based in the attackers' racism.

"It is important to intervene in this case to support the judge's message to hate-mongers that their crimes are not welcome in this multicultural society upon which Canada is built."

The Quebec Court of Appeal is scheduled to hear B'nai Brith's motion to intervene Feb. 7.

The appellants are Brant Smith, Claude Brunet and Daniel Brunet.

While courts are generally reluctant to grant intervener status to public interest groups in criminal appeals, exceptions can be made at their discretion where important public law issues are considered.

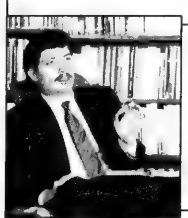
The league has received such status before many levels of courts, including the Supreme Court of Canada, mostly in cases where there is a clash between hate expression and fundamental freedoms. This is, however, the first time it has sought to intervene in a Quebec criminal case.

B'nai Brith said it is important to be there to buttress Cadieux's decision because both the defence and the Crown did not agree that this was a hate crime, and therefore the league would be the only party at the appeal to provide a supporting argument on this point.

Rabbi Singer, world renowned, dynamic and captivating speaker on "The Hebrew-Christian Movement" exposes the real threat to our world Jewish community

Rachelle and David Bronfman invite the Jewish Community to hear Rabbi Tovia Singer on Sunday, January 23, at 8pm, to the Village Shul

The Messianic Movement and the year 2000; What is the connection and why the Jews?



It will leave you astounded and better educated to fight against predatory groups like Jews for Jesus that are spending 300 million dollars annually to deceptively entice Jews to convert to Christianity.

Toronto man donates kidney to his brother in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

Brent and Kerry Pearlman.

WINNIPEG — When Kerry Pearlman, a Winnipeg criminal lawyer, asked his older brother, Brent, for a kidney, the Toronto realtor immediately said yes.

Both brothers are progressing well. Brent has already returned to his real estate practice while Kerry is looking forward to getting back to work – if all continues to go well – by the end of January.

The drama began at Rosh Hashanah in 1996 when Kerry, who has had diabetes since he was 13, was rushed to hospital with congestive heart failure. His kidneys had been slowly giving out for some years. At the hospital, he was immediately put on dialysis.

"When Kerry took ill and first asked me about donating a kidney, I readily agreed," says Brent. "I didn't know much about the procedure at the time but, due to logistical problems, I have had three years to become something of a lay authority."

After searching the Internet and talking to donors throughout North America, Brent Pearlman learned that 35 years of research has confirmed that people can function very well with one healthy kidney.

Pearlman, who is the gabbai at the Bet Yosef Congregation in the Riverdale area in Toronto, also looked into the halachic rulings.

"There is a misapprehension that Jewish people are not allowed to donate organs," Pearlman said. "I consulted with a number of rabbis who said that was not the case. When it comes to saving a life, organ donation is permissible. My fellow congregants supported my decision 100 percent."

'Emotional component'

Before Pearlman's offer of a kidney was approved, he had to go through a rigorous work-up (in Toronto) from which he received a clean bill of health.

While there is normally four or five months between approval of an organ donation like this and the actual surgery, the Pearlman brothers had just over two weeks notice. Fortunately, Brent was able to complete all his business dealings by Nov. 30.

Brent Pearlman recalls his feelings the night before the operation.

"You feel anxious in a pleasant way," he says.

Kerry adds that there is an "incredibly strong emotional component to organ donation. It takes an incredible commitment."

While Brent was in surgery and Kerry was waiting his turn, he received a letter from a woman telling him about her husband's kidney transplant 25 years before, and how well it turned out.

"It was a heart-warming letter which calmed me going into the operation," he says.

"The first thing you want to know after surgery is if the transplant worked. As soon as I opened my eyes in the recovery unit, a nurse assured me that my new kidney was working."

The brothers spent five days together sharing a hospital room – the first time they had shared a room together since they were kids, Brent notes.

Before going home, their sister, Lisa, flew in from Toronto to help look after them. Lisa works as a nurse in a heart transplant unit.

"She was a godsend," says Kerry. "This was truly a family effort which has brought us all closer together."

It has also made a dramatic change in the quality of Kerry Pearlman's life. He used to have to spend 11 hours every night hooked up to a dialysis machine. He is now free.

Brent noticed the difference at a Shabbat supper at a cousin's house a couple of weeks after the operation. "I needed to rest," he says, "but Kerry was having a great time visiting. For the first time in three years, he didn't have to worry about getting home early for his dialysis."

Kerry recounts that his wife, Leora, was reading their little girl, Madison, a children's story about transplants in which the new kidney was given a name. The eight-year-old decided to name her dad's new kidney

"Lucky because," she said, "he is lucky to have received it."

Back in Toronto, Brent Pearlman is now planning on volunteering his time at St. Michael's Hospital in Toronto as a peer support for others who may be considering donating kidneys.

"I want to make sure that people get the right information," he says.

"There is not a lot of counselling available out there."

Death no longer viewed as part of life, says doctor

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Modern medicine has given people longer and healthier lives than ever.

But despite that – and maybe because of it – the fear of death has grown and with that, unrealistic expectations of what doctors and technology can do to extend life, said the acting director of the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) clinical ethics committee, Dr. Harold Frank.

Frank, who is also emeritus chief of medicine, was speaking at the annual André Aisenstadt Clinical Day, which was on the theme of End of Life Scenarios – The Ethical Dimensions.

People have always feared death, he said. The difference is that today we have become estranged from the dying, and death is no longer seen as a natural part of life.

Until 50 or 60 years ago, most deaths occurred at home. Today, a majority of people die in institutions, he said. Many end their days connected to mechanical support. Technology has given the impression that death can be postponed indefinitely.

"Death is seen as a mark of failure (on the part of doctor). Death is no longer viewed as a normal consequence of living. Death represents a defeat. Death is not accepted but must be combated with all forces available," Frank said.

What we are seeing is the "depersonalization" of death. People are more emotionally and physically distanced from death, he said.

"There is a greater fear and abhorrence of dying than ever before, despite the fact that we have longer and better quality of lives than ever before."

Dr. Michael Dworkind, chair of the event and director of palliative care service at the JGH, said that when he hears people say "the Jewish General killed my grandmother" he believes medical staff must have failed to communicate to the families.

Doctors, he said, have to reassure survivors that everything was done professionally and with dignity.

Another speaker, Dr. Michael Gordon, head of geriatrics and internal medicine at Toronto's Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, spoke about the converse: trying to persuade elderly, chronically ill patients to accept treatment.

He recounted the case of an 82-year-old man who wanted doctors to give him something to end his life when his health deteriorated.

He had suffered three heart attacks in years past, and now had severe heart failure that greatly limited his physical ability. He was depressed over the recent death of his wife and also faced the prospect of giving up a relatively independent life and being placed in chronic care.

"Legally, doctors can withhold or withdraw treatment at the patient's request," Gordon said. "But assisted suicide or euthanasia is not allowed in Canada."

The agreement doctors reached with the man was that they would only treat him for comfort, that is, administer morphine, as required. A "Do Not Resuscitate" (DNR) order was put in his file.

"Three weeks later, he developed a lung infection and was treated with morphine. He died comfortably," Gordon said.

Frank commented that he respects a patient's wish to commit suicide. They are "not depressed and there is a logic in what they are doing."

Gordon, however, expressed reservations about assisted suicide or euthanasia because of the risk that doctors could "lose sensitivity once such a decision is made. It's easy to go from one level down to another."

He said he already sees doctors becoming "inured" in cases when a patient has a DNR order on their chart.

"The slippery slope is real," he said.

Once doctors decide one life is not worth living, the criteria for such a decision is open to interpretation from then on, he indicated.

"Yes, people are suffering, but the implications [of euthanasia] for society are dangerous," he said.

Frank wanted to know what the difference was between doctors deciding not to treat a terminally ill patient who develops pneumonia and a "more active decision" that results in the death of a patient.

Gordon insisted "there are differences ethically, and certainly emotionally."

The day was held in memory of Dr. Allen Spanier, former chief of the JGH intensive care unit (ICU), who died suddenly last April during a coroner's inquest into the death of one of his patients. Spanier was also co-chair of the ethics committee.

A plaque was unveiled that will hang in the ICU which states that he will be "remembered with great respect for his extraordinary compassion and devotion to his patients, their families and his students.

"His memory is a source of inspiration for us to provide the best possible care to our critically ill patients."

Spanier, who was 52 when he died, had been with the ICU for 21 years, as well as a surgeon.

Frank, who had been ethics committee co-chair with Spanier, said he was "extremely human in every sense of the word. He had a gruff exterior, but a soft, sensitive interior."

A living tribute to Spanier was a man in the audience who credited him for bringing him back to life from clinical death. The man suffered a heart attack in 1981 and was in the ICU under Spanier's care. "I heard the angels singing…and then Dr. Spanier was there to bring me back."

CJN Internet marks its second birthday

By JEFF ROSEN
Internet Editor

Two years in the life of a newspaper is usually considered but a pebble in the ocean of public information. However the rapid growth of high-technology and Internet newspapers has drastically altered this notion.

Two years ago The Canadian Jewish News joined the Internet revolution, launching its own Internet edition, created in part to boost readership and expand the newspaper's scope.

In two years, it has done just that.

Comment

By their very nature, Web editions are a more fluid medium, incorporating change at a far greater pace. This has certainly been true at The CJN Internet.

Since its launch, we have added candlelighting times for our major coverage areas (Toronto and Montreal), incorporated a column by and for teenagers, added book reviews and food coverage into our many specialty areas, while consolidating others. We have also become an affiliate of Indigo.ca, an on-line bookstore.

However I feel that our greatest accomplishment to date has been the addition of an international news section.

The international news section was created last year in the wake of the shooting at the Jewish Community Centre in Los Angeles. At the time, news from the scene was changing by the hour and we felt it important to keep our readers up-to-date on the latest developments.

From that one incident, the international news section was born, changing on a daily basis to keep readers abreast of Jewish news from around the world. It is interesting to note that we are one of the only Jewish newspapers online that updates its Web site on a daily basis.

Our second major accomplishment came last month in an e-mail from Wilfred Laurier University in Waterloo, Ontario. It stated that the university would be offering an online course on world religions and planned to use our site as one of the many teaching resources on the World Wide Web.

So, as well as a source of information for readers, The CJN Internet has become a teaching tool.

When we launched our site two years ago, CJN general manager Gary Laforet called the Web site a " work in progress."

However as CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat said at the time "we will never rest on our laurels."

In the months and years ahead, we will continue to strive to improve our site to make it useful and relevant to all our Web viewers.

Happy Birthday cjnews.com!

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Howard Morry, the new president of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC), says that he is a rarity in that he comes from the Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) side.

"It has been a real eye-opener," says the partner in the law firm of Pitblado Buchwald Asper where he specializes in taxation and estate planning.

"When you are focusing on fund-raising, you can sometimes forget that it is a means to an end – helping to keep the community strong. In my new role, I am gaining a much broader view of the community."

The 40-year-old Morry, who grew up next door to his immediate predecessor, Larry Hurtig, came into community work through the Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

Morry was invited to join the CJA team as a result of his work on behalf of the Hebrew University. He was most recently vice-president of Financial Resource Development for the WJCC. He also chaired the community's Millennium Committee.

He also served as chair of Men's Youth Aliyah and is a member of B'nai Brith's Advisory Council. He was awarded the WJCC's Harry Silverberg Young Leadership Award in 1993.

Nationally, Morry is on the board of directors of the United Israel Appeal Federations of Canada. He is also on the Board of Trustees of United Jewish Communities for North America.

As the new WJCC president, he sees the organization's mission as twofold – ensuring that the needs of the more vulnerable members of the community are filled and ensuring that all members of the community can connect Jewishly in whatever way they are comfortable.

Among the challenges, he notes, are strengthening the BJE and the Jewish school system and encouraging younger members of the community to stay here or move back.

He points to the success of the Montreal Jewish Community's Pro Montreal program as a model that could be emulated in Winnipeg.

"We have a wonderful community," Morry says. "Our role as a federation is to try to make sure that all of the community's needs are being met effectively."

Weizmann scientists working to aid diabetics

REHOVOT — Scientists at the Weizmann Institute of Science are testing new vanadium compounds that may help type II diabetes patients.

Diabetic patients suffer from a metabolic disorder in which the insulin responsible for allowing the passage of energy-rich nutrients from the bloodstream into the body's cells does not function properly or at all.

Diabetes affects 15 million Americans; 90 percent of these cases are classified as type II diabetes.

Type I diabetes is caused by a shortage of insulin production from cells in the pancreas. Type II diabetes is the result mainly of resistance or insensitivity of cells to insulin activity.

One of the approaches to treating type II diabetes is to find a new chemical that will serve as a viable alternative to insulin and thus will not be affected by problems of insulin resistance.

Weizmann Institute scientists have recently made significant progress in this area, which may one day lead to the development of a treatment that will considerably improve the quality of life of those suffering from type II diabetes.

Some two decades ago, Prof. Yoram Shechter of the Institute's biological chemistry department was one of the first scientists to discover that vanadium, a metallic trace element, mimics most of the metabolic effects of insulin in tissue studies. When given to diabetic rodents, vanadium corrects many metabolic defects associated with diabetes, in which insulin is lacking or is not functioning properly.

Since that discovery, scientists at the Institute and elsewhere have conducted intensive studies aimed at utilizing vanadium in the treatment of diabetes, as an artificial substitute for insulin.

Such treatment would have two major advantages. First, unlike insulin, which needs to be injected into the bloodstream, vanadium can be given in the form of pills. Second, on the molecular level, vanadium's mechanism of action is largely different from that of insulin. This makes vanadium particularly valuable in the treatment of cases in which insulin is ineffective.

The use of vanadium as a substitute for insulin, however, has been stymied until now by the fact that vanadium, like many other ions, is toxic in the high concentrations that must be used to make it effective.

The goal of vanadium-related research in diabetes has been to develop vanadium-based compounds that are less toxic and, if possible, have greater anti-diabetic potency than vanadium itself.

Now, some institute scientists including Shechter, Prof. Mati Fridkin of the organic chemistry department, and graduate student Itzhak Goldwaser have managed to achieve just that.

After checking hundreds of chemicals, the team has found one family of amino acid analogues that, when forming a complex with vanadium, are three to four times more effective in mimicking the effects of insulin than vanadium alone.

In a study reported in the Journal of Biological Chemistry, the institute scientists showed that the new compounds – patented through Yeda Research and Development Co. Ltd., which deals with the commercialization of the institute's research – are effective in regulating glucose levels in diabetic laboratory animals.

These substances are being developed for clinical use by a start-up company, LAPID Pharmaceuticals Ltd., created recently by Pamot Venture Capital Fund and Yeda. Further animal studies must be conducted to show whether the compounds are appropriate for application in humans.

Healthy eating involves making food choices: dietitian

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — According to Sharon Gottlieb, a registered dietitian and director of nutrition at the Fitness Institute, diet is a four-letter word.

Author of Seeing the Light: Eat Well, Be Active, Feel Good About Yourself Once and For All (Nutrition Institute), Gottlieb says that going on and off diets is a national pastime, "often referred to as the diet roller-coaster. No matter what you call it, it is not a ride you want to be on."

Gottlieb, "a lifelong chronic dieter," says that the success of all diets depends on the strict adherence to a plan. "The minute you eat food that is not allowed on the diet, you've cheated, and you feel guilty.

"This ultimately leads to low self-esteem and an unhealthy outlook on food and eating. With each failure, the dieter feels more and more discouraged."

Dieting, she says, is about control, not about satisfaction. "Typically, when a dieter is off the diet, they feel out of control. With dieting, all that matters is numbers – how much you should weigh, how many pounds you've lost or gained, how long it will take to reach your goal.

"By concentrating on numbers, instead of what is happening in your body, you ignore the fact that your body knows what is best for you, even if you don't think so. You need to learn to work with your body, not against it."

Achieving weight goals with healthy eating, however "is a whole other story. With healthy eating, all foods are allowed, so you don't ever have to go off anything," she says.

It was when she realized that there was no magic answer, that the next diet was not the "one" diet, that "I saw the light, and recognized that a lighter, healthier way of eating is the way to go."

Healthy eating, says Gottlieb, is a continuum. "It's about making food choices, not about being perfect. Breathe a sigh of relief, and start enjoying your food."

Although most food choices should be made from lower fat foods, such as whole grain breads, cereals, vegetables and fruits, skim or one percent dairy products and leaner meats, you can have a higher fat food or consume a large meal, says Gottlieb. "This does not mean that you have abandoned your commitment to eat in a healthy way.

"What it does mean, is that on this particular occasion, you've made choices from the higher fat end of the continuum. At your next meal, all you need to do is make choices from the lower fat end, to balance the extra fat and calories."

The notion of good and bad foods, she says, should no longer exist. "In its place is the healthy eating continuum, which includes all foods from which you are constantly making choices.

"You can occasionally have your cake and still achieve your healthy weight and lifestyle goals once and for all. Aim for making enjoyable, lighter choices, not perfection," she says.

Gottlieb says to make small lifestyle changes. "The first step in achieving and maintaining your healthy weight goal is to reduce your intake of fat. Start with simple moves like replacing butter and margarine with fruit spread, using oil minimally, avoiding fried foods, and instead of putting cream in your coffee, switching to milk. These are key strategies to reducing your fat intake without making radical changes that are hard to stick to."

Set mini-goals, she says, such as a five or 10 pound weight loss, and think of non-food ways to reward yourself. "I also recommend daily affirmations – thinking of three things a day that people feel happy or successful about. Pounds lost are not the only measure of success.

"Pick a new recipe – something that incorporates healthy choices. All these little changes add up."

The book, which includes a personal journal and a light shopping list, also offers a variety of light recipes, such as speedy vegetarian chili, presto pasta primavera, peachy chicken breasts, ginger fish fillets, festive meatballs, heavenly chocolate meringues and cola baked apples.

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

SHEPHERDSTOWN, W.Va. — Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Shara left on Monday after a week of intensive efforts by the United States to bridge the gaps between Israel and Syria.

From the Shepherdstown Document, a working paper presented by U.S. President Bill Clinton to both sides, it appears that Israel has dropped its opposition to a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights to a new line to be determined, depending on security arrangements and other national security interests, such as water.

Barak, describing the week-long talks over territory, peace terms, water and security as "complex and difficult," had made it clear on the weekend that he would leave Monday.

On the sensitive issue of establishing a new border, once Israel pulls back on the Golan Heights, Foreign Minister David Levy said that "nothing has been agreed upon." But the Shepherdstown working paper indicates Israel's readiness for a full pullback if appropriate security guarantees are put in place.

Clinton intervened in the negotiations four times before Sunday and returned for a fifth time on Monday. "He's going for meetings. The process continues," a White House official said.

Committees met Sunday to discuss all the key issues, and State Department spokesperson James P. Rubin said the two sides responded positively to a statement presented on Friday by the United States. The seven-page document, which is a summary of areas of accord and discord, could become the basis for an eventual "core agreement," Rubin said.

But, he added, Israel and Syria still face "enormous decisions" and "we don't expect those decisions to be made in a matter of days."

He denied reports in the London-based Al Hayat newspaper that American mediators had offered "bridging proposals" designed to close the gap where the two sides were in disagreement.

IDF service may be reduced

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The army's Human Resources Branch has decided that compulsory army service for 18-year-olds will be reduced by six months beginning in August 2001 if a peace treaty with Syria is signed and the IDF withdraws from Lebanon.

The decision still requires the approval of Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz, but IDF sources said during the weekend that the directive issued by Prime Minister Ehud Barak to abbreviate army service as an immediate product of peace agreements ensures that this will, in fact, become official policy.

Male draftees currently serve a three-year stint in the IDF. The August 1998 call-up is expected to be the last one that serves three years.

The reduction of service to 30 months was decided about a week ago in a meeting headed by the head of the human resources branch of the General Staff, Brig.-Gen. Avinoam Laufer. The decision was made known to the deputy chief of staff, Maj.-Gen. Uzi Dayan.

According to calculations made by the General Staff, the IDF will save about NIS 800 million a year by cutting compulsory service for males to 30 months from its present 36.

However, most of the money saved – some NIS 600 million – will be required to pay for alternative manpower.

When Barak served as chief of staff, he sought to reduce compulsory service, even if this meant continuing reserve service at its normal level. Barak's successor, Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, changed the emphasis and preferred to cut reserve service, and that policy remained in force under Mofaz as well until the establishment of the Barak government.

The original Military Service Law set army service for males between 18 and 26 years old at 30 months. This was upped to three years after the 1967 Six-Day War, though it was not until 1995 that the extra half-year was legally formalized in an emergency order.

The order has been renewed every year since then. The current order will expire on June 17, 2000. Two months ago, the IDF's legal experts stated that "at least in the coming years," the three-year period would have to continue "in the light of the army's needs and the policy of cutting reserve service."

Temple Mount antiquities dumped

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Digging along the northern wall of Solomon's Stables on Jerusalem's Temple Mount is continuing without any archeological supervision by the Antiquities Authority, and truckloads of dirt containing ancient artifacts are landing in the city dump.

The Waqf, the Islamic trust that oversees Muslim holy sites on the Temple Mount, initially received approval to open an emergency exit for the basement area of a mosque, but the digging has continued on a much larger scale.

A trench 20 metres wide and 50 metres long has now been dug, exposing five ancient arches.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak approved the opening of two of these arches, which will become main entrances to the mosque instead of an emergency exit.

A third arch was also broken through, but police ordered it to be refilled. The Waqf also dismantled an ancient structure, possibly an aqueduct, located opposite the fifth arch.

A group of students from Bar-Ilan University, aided by several prominent archeologists, have studied samples of artifacts found in this discarded soil. They discovered that 19 percent of the artifacts date back to the Second Temple period, 15 percent belong to the early Islamic era and 14 percent date from the Byzantine period.

Polish Jewish property claims may face new restrictions

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WARSAW — A new recommendation by a parliamentary committee in Poland could prevent Polish Jews from claiming their share of billions of dollars of private property confiscated during the Communist regime, in the estimate of a local attorney.

Aryeh Edelist, the chairman of the Association for the Restitution of Private Jewish Property in Poland, told Ha'aretz that the recommendation applies only to real estate because the organization has waived its right to make commercial and industrial claims.

The recommendation would limit the return of private property solely to Jews who were residents and citizens of Poland during the past five years. The latest proposal is even more restrictive than the current regulations, which provide for compensation only for property confiscated by the Communist regime from 1946 on, and not for property seized by the Nazis during World War II.

Sixth Annual CJN Purim Art Contest

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 16. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small or too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, February 21, 2000. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: Children will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 3, 2000.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 16, 2000. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Jews greet Putin with mixed reviews

By LEV GORODETSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

While Russians are viewing Vladimir Putin's ascent to power as a surprise New Year's present, Jewish observers are decidedly more mixed.

Analysis

Some share the general Russian population's enthusiasm for Putin, who became president Dec. 31 when Boris Yeltsin suddenly resigned; others are cautiously optimistic.

Still others fear the possibility of increased anti-Semitism and a move away from democracy.

Little was known about Putin when Yeltsin nominated him to be prime minister in August.

But Putin's popularity soared in September with the start of the Chechen war, and it has skyrocketed more recently to unprecedented heights, approaching an 80 percent approval rating.

Putin, whose party came in a close second in last month's parliamentary elections, is also seen as being virtually a shoo-in to win Russia's presidential elections, which have now been moved to March from June.

Putin has recently cultivated an image of being friendly toward Jews.

In November, he met with leaders of the newly created Chabad Lubavitch-dominated Federation of Jewish Communities of Russia, telling them he was sympathetic to Jewish causes.

The move partially backfired when a number of Jewish leaders in Russia complained that Putin had, perhaps inadvertently, singled out one of Russia's umbrella Jewish groups for support in an attempt to divide the Jewish vote.

One Jewish leader who is enthusiastic about Putin is Rabbi Zinovy Kogan, one of the leaders of Reform Judaism in Russia, who called Putin's rise to power "a positive development for Russian Jewry."

Kogan met with Putin last month after the prime minister returned from Norway, where he had met with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

Putin "spoke very warmly about Barak, saying he was the single one there to support Russia's position over fighting terrorism in Chechnya," said Kogan, who is also one of the leaders of Keroor, the Congress of Jewish Religious Communities and Organizations of Russia.

Putin said "he was going to supervise personally the investigation of the latest synagogue bombings and some other anti-Semitic acts," Kogan said, referring to the recent wave of attacks against Jews.

A Jewish journalist from St. Petersburg who first met Putin when he was an aide to that city's mayor in the early 1990s, said that in discussions about getting humanitarian medical aid from Israel to St. Petersburg, Putin "sounded quite sympathetic toward Israel and Jews in general.

"He made an impression of a very accurate, efficient and responsible man, which is rare in the Russian bureaucracy," said the journalist, who asked not to be identified.

Vladimir Putin

Despite the sense among some that Putin cares about Jews more than Yeltsin, Jews on the whole don't seem as happy as other educated and professional Russians about the rise to power of this former KGB colonel.

"It turns out that the intelligentsia no longer need freedom, but want a tough hand," said pollster Yuri Levada, director of the All-Russia Center for Public Opinion Research. He cited figures that show the Chechen war has more support among the better-educated cities of Moscow and St. Petersburg than in smaller cities and towns.

At the same time, many fear that the popularity of the Russian war against Chechen rebels could reverberate in Russian society.

The campaign against "Chechen terrorists" could "bring about strengthening of xenophobia in the society, which inevitably brings intensification of anti-Semitism," said the St. Petersburg journalist.

Putin "has risen to power on the back of a racist war which appeals to the worst xenophobic instincts of the Russians," he said, adding, "We have to monitor him and make sure that he knows what we care about" and that pro-democracy forces and Jewish groups "hold him accountable."

For many Jews in Russia, Putin remains tainted by the corruption that was so prevalent during Yeltsin's regime.

Some worry that he was created by a Jewish media tycoon, who continues to shadow Russia's new leader.

Berezovsky's officially state-controlled national TV channel ORT openly manipulated Russian public opinion during the campaign, constantly praising Putin and pounding Putin's rivals for presidency – former prime minister Yevgeny Primakov and Moscow Mayor Yuri Luzhkov, who is known to be very friendly with another Jewish media tycoon Vladimir Goussinsky, the head of the Russian Jewish Congress.

A Moscow university lecturer, Galina Eliasberg, expressed an opinion that is shared by many in Russia's Jewish intelligentsia.

"The guy came to power on the wave of the Chechen war. He seems created by Berezovsky," said Eliasberg.

"I don't think he will put the country in order; on the contrary, I have an impression that some force behind him can overwhelm him and then the army will seize power or something like that," she said.

Russia's chief rabbi, Adolph Shayevich, who is active in the Russian Jewish Congress and friendly with Luzhkov, is more cautious in speaking about Putin.

"Boris Yeltsin has made a brilliant move. But it is hard to say whether the appointed successor will prove his real successor, including his attitude toward Jews," he said.

At the official New Year's Eve reception at the Kremlin, Rabbi Shayevich said Putin told him he wished "happiness and prosperity" to all Jews.

But Rabbi Shayevich added, "It could be only an official gesture. We'll see."

The Week in Israel

Jan. 3

• The Attorney General is investigating President Ezer Weizman for receiving cash, totalling nearly $500,000 (US), between 1988 and 1993 when he was a Knesset and cabinet member. The cash was given by Weizman's friend Edouard Serousi who lives in France. (Later in the week Public Security Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami said that it was up to Weizman, for the time being, to decide whether to continue in his position.)

Jan. 4

• Israel and the Palestinians reached agreement on Israel's next withdrawal from the West Bank. Negotiators agreed on the original map presented by Israel for the transfer of an additional 5 percent of the land. (IDF withdrawal began the next day.)

Jan. 5

Jan. 6

• The Jewish National Fund said it owns some 19 square miles of land in Syria, adding it hoped Israel could make use of that fact during talks with Syria about the fate of the Golan Heights. "We have the titles; we have the maps; we have the contracts of sale," the JNF's legal adviser said. The land was purchased by Jews in the late 19th and early 20th centuries and was transferred to the JNF after 1948.

• Israel released 22 Palestinians jailed for common crimes, in a goodwill gesture to mark the end this week of Ramadan.

Jan. 7

• According to a Radio Free Europe correspondent in Jerusalem, Romania's visiting president told acting Prime Minister Yitzhak Mordechai that Romania, Israel and Turkey should set up a "strategic partnership." Emil Constantinescu also raised the subject of the problems of some 50,000 Romanian workers in Israel, who have often complained about discrimination and poor employment conditions.

Croatian Jews welcome election results

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZAGREB — The Jewish community here is welcoming the results of Croatia's recent parliamentary elections, hoping that the change of government will end their country's isolation.

The apparent victory of a centre-left coalition in the elections on Jan. 3 marks the end of a highly nationalistic regime led by the late president, Franjo Tudjman.

The coalition, which includes the Social Democrats under Ivica Racan, and Social Liberals led by Drazen Budisa, have promised to build bridges to the West, which, according to historian Ivo Goldstein, is good news for Croatia's 2,000 Jews.

"The Jewish population wants to be part of an integration of states because we want to have more intensive contact with other communities," said Goldstein, a professor of Jewish history at the University of Zagreb.

Final results will not be available until later this month, but Racan seems set to be the country's new prime minister. Elections for a new president are slated for Jan. 24, and this week's results are seen as an important precursor to those presidential elections.

Goldstein was particularly elated by the results – his father, Slavko Goldstein, was a founder of the Social Liberals and was the party's first leader from 1989 to 1990.

But Goldstein wasn't the only one who was pleased by the election results.

He said he was at the Jewish community centre the day after the elections and "everybody was – not celebrating, but very happy."

The vote marked the first time that the Croatian Democratic Union, which was led by Tudjman from 1990 until his death at the end of last year, has lost power since Croatia declared independence from Yugoslavia in 1991.

'Croatia's 2,000 Jews have nothing to fear'

Tudjman's support of a client Croat army in Bosnia and his refusal to deliver accused war criminals for trial had isolated Croatia internationally.

Goldstein said events in the 20th century had cut Croatia's Jewish community off from other European communities.

Croatian entry into the European Union – still a very far-off prospect, because the EU has not even accepted Croatia as an applicant – would help reverse that trend, Goldstein said.

He said that although the Social Democrats are the reformed Communist party, and Budisa of the Social Liberals has a nationalist past, Croatia's Jews have nothing to fear.

"Racan is a social democrat like in Germany, and Budisa was a nationalist but is moving towards liberalism," said Goldstein.

"Budisa has never said anything about Jews," the historian said. "He is very, very far from Tudjman in terms of Jews, history, Europe, America.

"Racan and Budisa are not the best men you could find on earth," he said, "but they're better than Tudjman."

Although there is some consensus that Tudjman, the architect of independent Croatia who died Dec. 10, was not an anti-Semite, he was sometimes accused of anti-Semitism, and he altered sections of his memoirs in English translation to mute that claim.

Tudjman was a nationalist who fought for the anti-Nazi partisans during World War II. After Israel and Croatia established diplomatic relations in 1997, the Knesset requested that Tudjman not visit the Jewish state. In the end, Croatia sent its moderate Western-oriented foreign minister, Mate Granic, in Tudjman's place.

Zagreb's small Jewish community was not sad to see Tudjman gone. He promoted "Croatia-centrism," under which all minorities were pushed to the margins, Goldstein said. "We were equal in rights, but not in value."

Slaven Letica, a former Tudjman advisor who became a prominent critic of the regime, dismissed the claim that Tudjman disliked Jews.

"He was poorly educated, not anti-Semitic," said Letica, who is not Jewish. "He was fascinated with the Bible and Jews as intellectuals."

The Jewish Community of Zagreb, which numbers about 1,500, had not taken an official position on the elections, said Dean Friedrich, secretary-general of the community.

Friedrich said Croatia's Jewish community has always had a good relationship with Croatian governments.

Because Yugoslav leader Josip Broz Tito broke with Stalin after World War II, Yugoslavia was never firmly part of the Soviet bloc and consequently did not have the same anti-religious attitude as much of the bloc, Friedrich explained.

He pointed out that the Jewish community centre has been housed in the same building since before the war. "The community here was always open to the public," he said.

Goldstein said the elections are part of the process of depoliticizing Jews and Judaism in Croatia after a year that saw the first eastern European trial and conviction of a concentration camp commander.

In October 1999, Dinko Sakic, 78, was sentenced to 20 years in prison for his crimes as commander of the Jasenovac camp during World War II.

Such issues are behind Croatia now, Goldstein said.

"Budisa and Racan are not speaking about the past. They want to speak about the future," he said.

"Jews are not a political issue anymore," Goldstein said. "We are part of the normal world."

Obituary

Daniel Elazar, prolific writer and scholar

By SARAH TAIEB CARLEN
Special to The CJN

Prof. Daniel Elazar died in Jerusalem on Nov. 30, 1999. He was the director of the Centre for the Study of Federalism at Temple University in Philadelphia; the founder and director of the Jerusalem Centre for Public Affairs; and the holder of the Senator Patterson Chair of intergovernmental relations at Bar Ilan University in Tel Aviv.

He had many Canadian colleagues in the Jerusalem Centre, including professors Harold Waller (McGill), Harvey Schulman (Concordia) and Michael Brown (York). Two works are being copublished by the Centre for Jewish Studies at York and Elazar's Centre.

Elazar frequently spoke in Canada. Prof. Sydney Eisen, founder of the Centre of Jewish Studies at York University, recalls that while our centre was only a fledgling institution, Elazar put the full use of his centre at our disposal.

Elazar was driven by an emotional and intellectual force, which, despite his physical limitations resulting from polio, enabled him to respond to invitations from around the world to give lectures and advise on a wide range of constitutional topics.

He wrote hundreds of articles, and reviews as well as several dozen books.

In 1988, then-president Ronald Reagan made him a member of the U.S. Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations.

Elazar derived enormous pride from his Sephardi heritage and he kept in touch with his Sephardi friends, whom he used to meet "for prayer at the Yisa Bracha synagogue…the leading congregation of the old Sephardi families of Jerusalem."

He felt "fortunate enough to be asked [in 1972] to serve as the first president of the reconstituted American Sephardi Federation (ASF)."

Over the years, Elazar and I developed a pleasant relationship based mostly on our common cultural Sephardi heritage.

Many eulogies have been written about him since his death, but none have dealt with this important component of his identity.

During one of my visits to Jerusalem, he offered me his book, The Other Jews, The Sephardim Today, from which I have chosen a few excerpts to complete the portrait of this outstanding Jew.

Elazar was always annoyed when Jews from Africa and Asia were referred to as Oriental: "This term…is a distortion based on false premises… For Jews, what is most important as a distinguishing characteristic is not the specific culture acquired in any…country of exile …but the broader issues of Halachah…and common cultural patterns, from food to synagogue rituals. In these respects, the Sephardi world is one, from the Atlantic to the Indian oceans."

Elazar was the first person who told me about the glorious role the Sephardim, including many members of his family, had played in the development of Israel before and after 1948: "Sephardim came to Israel of their own free will because they saw the state as the beginning of Jewish redemption, not as refugees from a Europe soaked with the blood of the Holocaust… The Sephardi version of Zionism is more in tune with the kind of Zionist expression that is needed today. Consequently, it should be explored, cultivated, and possibly used as a model for a new vision."

Elazar deplored the social gap between Sephardim and Ashkenazim and he noted: "Studies show that among Sephardi families that separated…those in Israel suffered educational deprivation, whereas those who went to the West became doctors, lawyers and academics in the same proportion as other Diaspora Jews. Native Sephardim whose families lived in Eretz Yisrael before World War II occupy the same socio-economic positions as their Ashkenazi brethren."

Elazar found it difficult to understand and accept the exclusion of Sephardi culture from Jewish day schools: "The religious schools have always presented eastern European Orthodoxy…to their students, a majority of whom are Sephardim, as authentic Judaism… The consequences of this breaking down of a culture harms not only the Sephardim but all of the Jewish world. Centuries of Jewish intellectual and cultural expression have been lost…It is hard to overemphasize the discrimination…against Sephardi culture in Israeli society. Ignorance may be an initial excuse, but continued ignorance shows an unwillingness to learn."

He did not spare his fellow Sephardim: "The blame is not only on the other side…Even when they were not at the mercy of the Ashkenazim, [the Sephardim] allowed these things to happen to themselves."

He concludes his book with an expression of hope: "The Ashkenazi world and its leadership must put a stop to the negative aspects of the Sephardi-Ashkenazi relationship, …not only to repair the breach but also because the cultural heritage of the Sephardi world is for all Jews …What we are witnessing is the last gasp of that division and the reintegration of the Jewish people around new dimensions of unity (and, one presumes, other divisions as well).

"The task of this generation is to bring about that reintegration in such a way that all parties can make their contributions as equals, so that all of Jewish life and culture will be enriched."

Torah Sages ban Internet use

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Almost the entire Council of Torah Sages recently signed a binding rabbinic opinion which sounds a "serious warning against the terrible dangers within computers, compact disc players, movies and the Internet."

The ruling was published last week. It gives a long list of tough restrictions on computer usage and imposes a strict ban on hooking up to the Internet, which is said to constitute a terrible danger to the Jewish people.

This is a far cry from the days when the computer was seen by the haredi community as a way for its women to support the family without leaving the house.

But what was once seen as a shield against excessive contact with the non-observant world is now perceived as a potential invader which, via the Internet, is liable to scale the halachic walls around the haredi community. The secular culture, against which haredi teachers have taken great pains to shield the community's children, is now easily accessible over the phone line by web-surfers.

The court's ruling, which was used as the halachic basis for last week's rabbinic opinion, mentions the harsh ban which the rabbis imposed upon television 30 years ago, and determines that "the Internet is a danger 1,000 times greater, and is liable to bring ruin and destruction upon all of Israel." The Internet threat "puts the future generations of Israel in grave danger in a way that no other threat has since Israel became a nation."

The Degel Hatorah party newspaper, Yated Neeman, reported yesterday that the special court had reached the conclusion that the Internet was the "world's leading cause of temptation, it incites and encourages sin and abomination of the worst kind."

In the evidence heard by the court it was reported that Internet users exposed themselves to "all the morbidities of corrupt culture" and endangered their spiritual well-being.

For professionals who are dependent on the Internet for their livelihood, the court imposed the obligation "to seek every possible way to reduce usage," and then only to use it at the workplace.

As a result, all persons not given permission for Internet use are called upon to delete the Internet browser from their Windows program, or call a professional to do it for them.

The Rabbinical Court of the Eda Haredit in the Mea Shearim neighbourhood of Jerusalem published a separate, harsher formulation, forbidding the use of the Internet even for commercial purposes and characterizing it as "a deadly poison [which] burns souls."

The question now arises of what is to be done with the dozens of haredi Web sites already on the Internet, including the haredi portal, Torahunt. The paradox is reflected in the fact that among the various signatories are the members of the Shas Council of Torah Sages, Rabbis Shimon Ba'adani and Shalom Cohen.

The head of the council is former Sephardi chief rabbi and Shas spiritual leader Ovadia Yosef, who has his own Web site.

Wood carvings on permanent display

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Three exquisite ritual wood carvings created by Ukrainian-born artist Dimitry Shteynberg are now part of the Reuben and Helene Dennis Beth Tzedec Museum's permanent collection.

Dimitry Shteynberg

"There are a number of artists in Israel and the United States creating Judaica in wood and inlays, but I have never seen such intricately carved and finely detailed functional pieces as the original works of Dimitry Shteynberg," says Dorion Liebgott, the museum's curator.

"Wood is a very rich material," says Shteynberg, 37. "It has warmth, much like the human body. It's very natural."

Shteynberg, an image designer for custom jewelry, was born in Odessa. At the age of 12, he began drawing and painting and went on to sculpt with plaster.

He studied at the art institute in Odessa, where he became fascinated with wood and began his career as a wood-carver.

He said it was hard to be a Jewish artist in Ukraine. "You couldn't express yourself because of the ideology, and although there is no official anti-Semitism, they still don't like Jews."

In order to retain your position as an artist in Ukraine, you have to display your art, he said.

"It was difficult to exhibit my art there because they discriminated against us – and then they would take away your status as an artist because you didn't exhibit."

In 1990, Shteynberg immigrated to Israel, where he studied traditional Jewish art.

"When I came to Israel, it was like finding my roots, my traditions. Because we were restricted in the Soviet Union, coming to Israel was being free."

Working as a Judaica artist for several Israeli art galleries, Shteynberg attracted private collectors and exhibited in the Temple Mount Institute Museum.

He came to Canada and settled in Montreal in 1991 and continued his career as a wood sculptor exhibiting at the Jewish Cultural Centre. Several years later, he moved to Toronto.

His pieces have been exhibited in museums and art galleries in Israel, New York and Ottawa, and at the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto.

"I realized that wood carvings with silver inlay take a great deal of time to produce – sometimes a month or more."

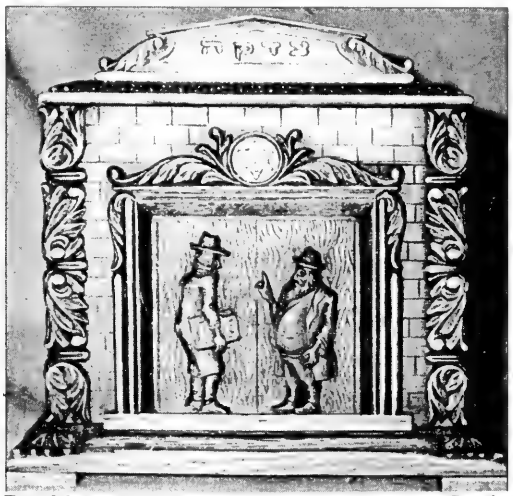
He creates tzedakah boxes, Torah pointers, candlesticks, challah boards with matching knives, mezuzot, Kiddush cups and etrog boxes.

He notes that in Canada, "not too many people will pay for such art."

To earn a living, therefore, Shteynberg turned to another love, designing jewelry.

"Most of the custom jewelry designed and created here is sent to the United States where there is a greater market."

Although Shteynberg hopes to continue his work as a wood-carver, today he is busy with gold, silver and stones, creating rings, necklaces and earrings.



Two of the wood carvings on display at Reuben and Helene Dennis Beth Tzedec Museum's permanent collection.

CHICAGO HOSTS EXHIBIT ON 1936 OLYMPICS

Marty Glickman, an 18-year-old sprinter from New York, went to Berlin in July 1936 to compete in the Summer Olympics. However, his American coaches pulled him from the 400-metre relay team at the last minute, presumably because he was Jewish. It was just one indicator of the engulfing evil of Adolf Hitler's dictatorship.

Glickman's is one of many stories presented in a new multifaceted exhibition which highlights athletes who boycotted, participated in, or were barred from the 1936 Summer Games.

The exhibition, The Nazi Olympics: Berlin 1936, was organized by the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. Using historical photographs, film and testimonies of athletes, the exhibition documents what has become known as "the most controversial games in modern Olympic history."

The exhibition details how the Nazis used the multinational event as a propaganda tool and sports itself as a way of purifying and strengthening the Aryan race.

Nearly half a century after being barred from the competition, Glickman returned to Berlin. "When I walked into that vast 120,000-seat stadium on a lovely August day, I looked at the stretch of track where I was supposed to run and then I looked across at where Hitler [had been] sitting, and suddenly a wave of anger came over me," he recalled.

"In that Olympic stadium, I started to shout...'How could you do this to an 18-year-old kid, me or anybody else?'" Recently, the U.S. Olympic Committee awarded Glickman a plaque to try to right the wrong of 1936. The exhibition opens Feb. 13 at the Spertus Museum, 618 South Michigan Ave., Chicago.

Jewish Arts Week: The American Guild of Judaic Art, which is headquartered in Owings Mills, Md., has designated March 6 to 10 as Jewish Arts Week "in celebration of the rich diversity and outstanding quality of Judaic art throughout the United States and worldwide."

The week coincides with the Biblical parshah Vayachel, which extols the role of the artist with the following verses:

"And the Lord spoke to Moses saying, See, I have called by name Bezalel the son of Uri the son of Hur of the tribe of Yehudah and I have filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom and in understanding and in knowledge and in all manner of workmanship to contrive works of art, to work in gold and in silver and in brass, and in cutting of stones to set them and in carving of timber to work in all manner of workmanship."

The guild hopes that museums, galleries, libraries, synagogues, community centres and media outlets will schedule Judaic arts events during Jewish Arts Week. For details, visit the Web site www.JewishArt.org.

Standing Up for Israel: Chicago comic-actor Joel Chasnoff was MC for Project Birthright, which unfolded last week in Jerusalem.

Chasnoff, who has served in the Israeli Defence Forces, performed stand-up comedy for the more than 4,500 people in attendance and introduced keynote speaker, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

Chasnoff, 25, also conducts seminars on Jewish humour and the role of humour throughout Jewish history. He is in the midst of a tour of college campuses around North America.

Vancouver's Capilano Bridge the ultimate tourist attraction

By NEILIA SHERMAN
Special to The CJN

The bridge swayed as I took my first step. There were at least two dozen people ahead of us and I wondered how this fragile looking structure could withstand the hoards of tourists who cross it each year.

But I had made my start and was determined to make it across. After watching other dare devils proudly bearing their "I survived Capilano" certificates earlier, I knew that I had to bring one home as well.

Over 100 years ago, George Grant Mackay came upon this beautiful spot. With the help of friends and a team of horses, he pulled a hemp and cedar bridge 135 metres across the Capilano River. The area became so popular that a more secure wire bridge was built in 1903 and then one with cable firmly encased in concrete was built in 1914.

Visitors from all over the world now flock to the Capilano Suspension Bridge. It is truly the ultimate tourist attraction – gorgeous wilderness a few minutes from downtown Vancouver combined with the hair-raising sense of danger when you walk across as the bridge shakes with each step you make.

In the 1930s local native peoples were invited to place their totem poles on the grounds and the originals still stand. The present suspension bridge was built in 1956. At that time prestressed wire cables were encased in 13 tons of concrete at either end.

The world's longest pedestrian bridge stretches across the canyon, 69 metres above the river. You may feel like you're taking your life in your hands when you cross but you'll be proud when you reach the towering evergreens on the other side.

My five-year-old son put me to shame by walking across like it was nothing while I clung to the rail quaking in fear.

Other features which make this attraction worthwhile are a Story Centre walk-through history exhibit, the Big House native peoples carving centre, where you can watch carvers at work, and the 1911 Trading Post gift shop which is filled with unique items made by local artists.

At $9.95 per adult and $3.15 per child, with children under 6 getting in free, we felt that this unique attraction was well worth the money. But there are plenty of things to do in Vancouver that are free and thoroughly captivating.

When my family had the opportunity to visit last August we fell in love with this West Coast paradise and even fantasized about moving there for much of the trip, until the exorbitant housing prices brought us down to earth. I'm told that this is a typical response to Vancouver's unbelievable beauty.

Vancouver holiday affordable for budget travellers

Where else can you find such a diverse urban experience against a backdrop of exquisite scenery? Almost surrounded by water, with beautiful snowcapped mountains and lush evergreens, your eyes will never tire of the view.

Yet, a Vancouver vacation can be very affordable for families on a budget. Keep in mind that by remaining in Canada, you avoid losing money through the awful US currency exchange.

We also saved bucks by forgoing a car rental and buying a two day pass to the Gray Line City Tour instead, which was $22 per adult and $13 for children over four. Our CAA membership saved us another $4 right off the bat.

The benefit of this mode of transportation is that you don't have to worry about getting lost and you can concentrate on the lovely surroundings.

This tour was great because we had the choice of getting off at any stop, or staying on and bypassing any or all of the stops. Another bonus was the fact that riding on a double-decker bus was just as entertaining to my son as any of the places that we visited. He sat riveted on the upper deck of the bus, taking it all in.

For free or inexpensive family fun, I recommend visiting the following places.

1. Stanley Park: In 1886, Vancouver's first city council petitioned the federal government to lease 400 hectares of land in order to establish the fledgling city's first green space. The park officially opened in 1886 and was named for Lord Stanley (of Stanley Cup fame) who was then the governor general of Canada.

This huge park has a free trolley service of its own, a water park with a large dryer that children can stand inside and an Art in the Park display. Go to Prospect Point to get a wonderful view of the city. For a minimal cost take the kids to the petting zoo or perhaps take in the pricier show at the very popular Vancouver Aquarium which is located inside the park with an admission price of $12.95 for adults and $7.95 for children. Our five-year-old loved the beluga whale show during which the audience is showered with water by the whales. The show was entertaining as well as educational. The most popular pastime in Stanley Park is to walk the eight-kilometre shoreline and take in the views which include lovely beaches backed by indigo mountains. We were content with more passive forms of relaxation.

2. Granville Island: Formerly an industrial area, the warehouses now hold shops, restaurants, a mall that is entirely for kids. There is also a theatre, and a number of nautical museums. Performers put on family oriented antics and the whole area is right on water. There are crafts stores, artists' studios and a colourful public market filled with neat edibles. We loved this funky people place. The best way to get there from downtown is to take the Aquabus. This fleet of commuter ferries operates seven days a week in False Creek and costs a couple of dollars depending on where you pick it up. Admission to Granville Island is free and wandering around can easily take up an entire day.

3. Robson Street: Vancouver's chic area, this street is good for window shopping. Have a coffee and soak in the atmosphere. Kids will love the toy stores and perhaps lunch at Planet Hollywood which is filled with big screen televisions and Hollywood memorabilia. It connects to Denman Street in the west end which has a more free-wheeling air if designer shopping is not your style.

4. The Beaches: This city is full of them. Go to English Bay for its wonderful view and natural environment. Here sun worshippers lie against conveniently placed logs rather than under umbrellas. Interesting stores and cafes complete the experience. Another favourite is the funky Kitslano area where the beach houses a playground, Vancouver's biggest outdoor pool. This is the place for people watching.

5. Located in the oldest part of the city, Gastown was a bustling frontier town during the gold rush. It has cobblestone streets, an antique steam clock that sounds the Westminster chimes, and is named for its founder Gassy Jack Deighton whose statue oversees Maple Tree Square. This fun area features souvenir shops, good restaurants, and great atmosphere.

So if enjoying mountains, ocean, culture, and adventure in a temperate climate, sounds like your idea of a great vacation, plan a trip to Vancouver, a place so beautiful that it will take your breath away. And it won't break the bank, either.

• Mythic Theatre is a new theatre program, facilitated by Dorothy Lichtblau, that explores the human condition through the performing arts, and examines the innate drama of Biblical narrative in particular. A special introductory workshop occurs Feb. 6, 3:30 to 6:30 p.m. Bloor JCC. Members $15, non-members $20. 922-4934.

•A Celebration of Yiddish Sweatshop Poets, featuring David Abramowitz, is offered by the Cranbrooke Friendship Club. The program, which is entirely in English, explores the lives and works of poets Morris Winchevsky, Morris Rosenfeld, Dovid Edelshtat and Joseph Bovshover. $5 admission includes light lunch. Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave. Monday January 17, 12:30 p.m. 416-789-5502.

•Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, starring Patrick Cassidy and Deborah Gibson, plays at the Pantages Theatre for 16 performances beginning Feb. 1. $89-$25. 416-870-8000.

•The Toronto Jewish Film Society present Lacombe, Lucien, a film by Louis Malle to launch its 22nd season.

This 1974 film tells the story of Lucien Lacombe, a young French peasant living in southwest France. It's the summer of 1944 and Lucien, failing to join the Resistance, ends up in the Gestapo.

Screenings are on Jan. 16 at 5:15 p.m and 7:45 p.m. at the Jackman Hall, Art Gallery of Ontario, 317 Dundas Street W., Toronto. Single tickets at $8 are available 15 minutes before the show. Memberships can be obtained from the Society's host organization, the Bloor JCC for $45. Call 416-924-6211

Renowned poets contributed to A Rich Garland, a poetry collection for A.M. Klein

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In the mid-1950s, at the height of his creative powers, poet A.M. Klein stopped writing, withdrew from public life and remained reclusive until his untimely death in 1972.

This retreat into silence, sometimes explained nowadays as clinical depression, was seen by Klein's fellow poets and many admirers as tragic and was the subject of much speculation. After his death, there was an outpouring from Canadian poets of elegies and memorials for Klein, who had taken on the aura of an enigmatic, haunted figure.

On the 90th anniversary of his birth, Seymour Mayne and B. Glen Rotchin have edited a collection of poems, not by Klein, but for him.

A Rich Garland (Véhicule Press) contains poems written about Klein during his lifetime, in the three years after his death, and more recently, including a few composed especially for this book. Together, they range over seven decades.

For Rotchin, 35, these tributes show that Klein can rightly be included among Canada's major 20th-century poets and that his influence continues to be felt among contemporary poets, especially those who, like Klein, write from their particular cultural traditions.

Rotchin, a published poet himself, said what he admires about Klein is that he was probably the first major Jewish poet in this country to write with a Jewish sensibility – in English.

"Klein made it okay to write authentically as a Jew in English, and not only Yiddish, the medium with which the community had been familiar. He blazed the trail," Rotchin said.

A. M. Klein

At the same time, Klein was sensitive to the Quebec milieu and showed an understanding of French-Canadians' attachment to their culture.

In his contribution, Abraham Moses, Rotchin observes, "Here, Abraham Moses/ was wedded to his past, imbibed lush doses/ from an heirloomed kiddush-cup. Ever the proud/ bridegroom, and linguistically well-endowed,/ he vowed his eternal soul true and loyal/ under raised cross-peaked chupah of Mount-Royal."

Klein was born in eastern Europe, and came with his parents to Montreal as an infant. He remained attached to his immigrant roots all his life.

The co-editors of this volume believe that Klein's accomplishment is felt well beyond the Jewish community. "Klein has influenced generations of writers to create authentically from their cultural traditions and experiences," they say.

Some of his later works exhibit a fine sensitivity to the French-Canadian experience. He spent the early years of his law practice in Rouyn-Noranda in northern Quebec.

One of the first poets to be inspired to put his thoughts about Klein into verse was Leo Kennedy, who was associated with the McGill Fortnightly Review. In his 1933 collection The Shrouding, Kennedy included Epitaph for the Living, in which he says of Klein: "He saw the fish-wives of the market place/ As princess of Zion; and he drew/ The junkmen hawking bottles, bones and rags,/ With every subtle word device he knew."

A young Leonard Cohen wrote two poems for Klein after visiting him during his sad final years, Song for Abraham Klein and To a Teacher. He found his mentor a "weary psalmist...The bread he sang so beautifully, That bread was mould."

Klein was also a fine craftsman, mastering traditional rhyme and metre to great effect, and was especially noted for his sonnets, Rotchin said. This talent is especially appreciated by today's poets who are returning to this form, after many years of the predominance of free verse.

Some of the contributors have imitated Klein's style as a means of tribute, among them 35-year-old Toronto poet Harold Heft. In The Poet Klein Editorializes, Heft appropriates Klein's voice and imagines his musings.

About one-third of the poems are written by non-Jews, and the one by Maria Fiamengo of Vancouver is, in fact, strongly Christian in its symbolism.

"The poetic pastiches and tributes in this volume inform and reveal like literary criticism," write Rotchin and Mayne.

"Klein's voice refracted through theirs extends the resonance of his achievement and offers invaluable commentary on a poet whose works continue to speak to us with a renewing urgency and significance."

Gridiron glory on New Year's Day

Kickers give the boot to bowl game opposition

By HARLAN ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO, N.Y. — Every football team, they say, has three main components: offence, defence and special teams. To win a big game, they have to click on all cylinders, including the kicking team. In close games, the kicking team can provide the difference.

This season's bowl games were no exception, as two Jewish kickers helped their teams to New Year's glory.

Punter/placekicker Hayden Epstein's booming punts and five point-after-touchdowns (PATs) were instrumental in the Michigan Wolverines' 35-34 overtime victory over Alabama in the Orange Bowl, while Vitaly Pisetsky clicked on a 31-yard field goal and hit on two singles to help the Wisconsin Badgers to a 17-9 Rose Bowl victory over Stanford.

The kicking game was especially evident in Miami as Crimson Tide kicker Ryan Pflugner failed to match Epstein's OT point-after-touchdown, giving the Wolverines the Orange Bowl victory. Epstein had a chance near end the game, on the last play of regulation time, but his potential 36-yard winning field goal was blocked.

Epstein was strong throughout the day, as his eight punts averaged 43.4 yards, outdistancing Alabama's 34.4-yard average.

The Wolverine's Epstein is a real "all-American" kid, who admitted that when he tried out for the freshman team at San Diego's Torrey Pines High School, kicking "was the only position my mom would let me play."

He went on to be a Parade magazine All-American and was recruited by more than 30 major colleges.

He is a true "triple-threat" on the field, handling Michigan's kick-offs, PATs and punts.

But it wasn't until the team's last four games that Epstein was handed all three kicking duties. An injury suffered in the off-season while doing agility drills – his cleat caught in the grass and twisted his knee, tearing his anterior cruciate ligament – made field goals too strenuous. He was able to punt and kick off throughout the season, but he had to wait until late in the year for his knee to heal before he was given the field goal duties.

A sophomore Academic All-Big Ten Conference, he punted 24 times for a 39-yard average, with three going over 50 yards and 11 landing inside the opponent's 20-yard line.

He equalled a Wolverine record by kicking a 56-yard field goal against Michigan State and he kicked a game-winner against Indiana, a game in which he dropped punts twice inside the 20. He was also named Big Ten Special Teams Player of the Week (POW).

Epstein, six foot two, 200 pounds, sent nearly half his kick-offs into the end zone.

Pisetsky, on the other hand, is a relative newcomer to American football. A native of the former Soviet Union, Pisetsky came to the United States as a high school student and until a few years ago, thought bowls were something you find in a kitchen cupboard.

Vitaly Pisetsky

A senior scholastically, Pisetsky is in his first year as Wisconsin's field goal kicker, although he handled the kick-offs last season.

Because of special circumstances related to his immigration, Pisetsky is eligible to return as kicker next season.

The five-foot-10, 228-pound kicker is a semi-finalist for college football's Lou Groza Award as outstanding kicker. He connected on 44 PATs and made 15 of 18 field goals, one of two from 50 yards or more and four of five from 40 to 49 yards.

He tied a school record with four field goals against Michigan State, and against Minnesota his 36-yarder with three minutes to play sent the game into overtime. In OT, he ended the game with a 31-yard field goal.

Pisetsky was named Wisconsin's special teams POW for both those game and won Big Ten Special Teams POW honours for the Minnesota and Ohio State games. No other conference player was special teams POW more than once in 1999.

In the second quarter of the Rose Bowl, Pisetsky nailed a 31-yard field goal but badly missed another three-pointer with 2:18 left to play that would have put the game out of reach. Fortunately for the Badgers, Stanford's last ditch drive stalled and Wisconsin, led by Heisman Trophy winner Ron Dayne's 200 yards rushing, went on to win its second consecutive Rose Bowl.

Special teams POW

Two other college kickers did well during the season, but their schools did not make post-season appearances. Jason Feinberg was the kicker for three years for the University of Pennsylvania; and Josh Frankel, a walk-on, became Oregon's regular kicker when their scholarship kicker was injured.

Dorean Kass, meanwhile, lined up for Stanford as a reserve defensive lineman.

The Inside Back

Of terrorists and stowaways

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Detractors have been calling Canada's immigration system a mess for as long as the country has had an immigration system. But the case of Ahmed Ressam, the suspected Algerian terrorist arrested last month at the B.C.-Washington border with a trunkload of enough explosives to flatten a city block, should be of concern even to those who shrug at a topic as dry as refugee policy.

It's long been known that Islamic extremist groups view Canada as a haven and an easily accessible springboard to nefarious activity stateside. Ward Elcock, director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), acknowledged as much, when he told a Senate committee in 1998 that Canada is home to more international groups – many of them associated with terrorism – than any other country, save the United States.

CSIS openly admits that over the past decade, terrorist groups such as Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad and Hamas have used Canada as a source of financial support and even as a base of operations, often in the guise of innocuous-sounding social welfare and charity groups, and mosques. Hezbollah especially, CSIS admits, has established an infrastructure in Canada that can assist operatives seeking haven here. The beleaguered spy agency has cited Canadian ties to the 1993 World Trade Centre bombing, while the New York-based Anti-Defamation League says it has solid evidence that one of two Palestinians arrested in 1997 for planning to bomb a Brooklyn subway sneaked in and out of Canada with ease.

(Authorities are usually quick to point out that it is not in these groups' interests to target domestic institutions or groups with ties to Israel; it's the United States and our porous borders they find attractive.)

But the Ressam matter should raise everyone's eyebrows. Here's what's known about him so far: After arriving at Mirabel airport on a false passport in 1994, he applied for refugee status, admitting he'd spent five months in detention in Algeria, having confessed to being an Islamic terrorist. But immigration officials were unimpressed because, as department spokeswoman Huguette Shouldice was quoted as explaining recently, many asylum seekers try to pass themselves off as terrorists to exaggerate the persecution they fear back home. In other words, minus any hard evidence, simply admitting you're a terrorist can bolster your refugee claim.

Ressam did not see fit to attend his refugee hearing and was deemed to have abandoned his claim. He appealed that to the Federal Court, lost, was issued a deportation order, and told to report to immigration officials once a month. This went on for over two years.

At some point, Ressam stopped checking in, and his became one of an estimated 40,000 outstanding deportation orders on Canada's books since 1994. Of those, Ottawa says it can't account for the whereabouts of roughly 20,000 people who were told to pack up and leave. Since Canada has no exit controls, it is not known how many of them are still here.

Ressam is one who stayed, and in 1998, he was arrested by Montreal police for stealing computers and cellphones. He served two weeks in jail, and it was after his release that local police issued an arrest warrant in connection with other thefts. By then, Ressam had successfully used a fake Quebec baptismal certificate to acquire a Canadian passport in another name.

Add all this up: Ressam admitted to being a terrorist, he failed to appear at his refugee hearing, he broke the terms of his deportation order, he was jailed, and he had outstanding arrest warrants. And he still had the wherewithal to do serious damage to any Canadian city of his choosing.

Will immigration minister Elinor Caplan tighten things up? Let's hope so. Meanwhile, Caplan is planning a trip to China in April to warn potential migrants against putting themselves in the hands of shady people smugglers.

She says her message will be that detention and deportation will likely await them in Canada.

Recently, Caplan told The CJN that "everyone is entitled under Canadian law to have their case heard," and that "in our [Jewish] tradition, we know the adage that if you save one life, you've saved the entire world."

Was she referring to the life of a fanatical bomber or a desperate stowaway?

About Seniors

Dr. Mark says...

By DR. MARK CLARFIELD

As Mark Twain so aptly summed up, "There are three kinds of lies – lies, damned lies and statistics." Still, we cannot get by without these functional figures. With respect to the elderly, there seem to be more and more about each day – elderly people that is, as well as the numbers describing them.

While physicians and pharmacologists have recently discovered the elderly, a small but dedicated group of demographers has for many years been quietly calculating the exact number of elderly. To determine how many there are requires an acceptable definition.

Sixty-five is the year after which a Canadian is classified as "old," whether he or she looks it, acts it or most important, feels it. But, from where did this number originate?

In fact, it has no biological validity. It is a mere convention, which was first established in the 19th century by German Chancellor Otto von Bismarck.

The concept of what constitutes "old age" also differs historically. For example, in 44 BCE, Cicero rejoiced at age 62 that, "No one is so old that he does not think he could live another year." In 43 BCE, Cicero passed quietly away.

In 1881, Canada was a relatively "young" country. Over the last century, it has undergone a demographic transition toward a more rectangular population pyramid. Most children born here today can expect to live for more than 75 years. As developing countries modernize over the next decades, the same demographic changes will probably also occur.

Statistics Canada predicts that by 2031, the older population will have increased by more than 200 percent! And the Jewish community, already the oldest in Canada, is aging even more rapidly.

But what are the implications of these forecasts? First, we must see the problem in context. Canada, which has largely come through its demographic transition, is by no means the "oldest" country in the world.

Nevertheless, these demographic transformations are real, inevitable and far-reaching. Few of Canada's major institutions, and those of its Jewish community, will remain untouched by these changes.

While there will no doubt be those who view the future with some anxiety, the words of the great French poet, Paul Claudel in his old age will doubtlessly reassure:

"Eighty years old! No eyes left, no ears, no teeth, no legs, no wind! And when all is said and done, how astonishingly well one does without them."

Holocaust revisionism on trial

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A British defence attorney gave a taste of the drama to come in the libel trial brought by a Holocaust revisionist against a Holocaust scholar during his opening statement last week.

"To put it bluntly," Richard Rampton told the judge, "he is a liar." Rampton is defending Holocaust scholar Deborah Lipstadt against David Irving.

This landmark trial, held in the august setting of London's Royal Courts of Justice, is expected to last for some three months and is likely to involve the most detailed judicial examination of the Holocaust since the trial of Adolf Eichmann in Jerusalem almost 40 years ago.

If Irving wins, analysts say, it could give credibility to Holocaust revisionism at a time when those who witnessed the horrors themselves are dying out.

The case centres around claims made against Irving, a British historian, by Lipstadt, a professor of Jewish and Holocaust studies at Emory University in Atlanta, in her 1993 book, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory, published by Penguin Books.

Lipstadt has a daunting task ahead of her. Under British law, the burden of proof is squarely on her and her publisher to show that Irving is indeed a deliberate distorter of events in World War II.

Irving, who is representing himself, suggested in his opening argument that beyond his claims against Lipstadt, there was an international Jewish conspiracy to destroy him.

Irving claims that Lipstadt defamed him by alleging that his writing "applauds the internment of Jews in Nazi concentration camps" and that he is "an Adolf Hitler partisan who wears blinkers and skews documents and misrepresents data in order to reach untenable conclusions."

In his opening statement, Rampton declared, "Lies may take various forms and may as often consist of suppression or omission as of falsehood and invention, but in the end all forms of lying converge into a single definition: willful, deliberate misstatement of the facts."

Irving, he contended, had employed "many different means to falsify history – invention, misquotation, suppression, distortion, manipulation and, not least, mistranslation."

Analysis

What is the border that the Israel Defence Force wants to see on the Golan Heights in the context of a peace treaty with Syria?

The answer to this question can be found in the line that former chief of staff Ehud Barak – who is today both prime minister and defence minister – traced in 1994.

This line, which would enable the IDF to hold on to the cliff on the Golan that overlooks the Hulah Valley, was what Barak presented to his Syrian counterpart, Hikmat Shihabi.

Barak's successor as chief of staff, Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, who is currently taking part in the negotiations with the Syrians, presented this very same line, with the approval of former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, when Shahak met with Shihabi.

Rabin, however, had already handed over to the Americans the so-called "deposit" – a willingness to pull back to the June 4, 1967 lines if Syria complies with all of Israel's other demands.

The IDF line was actually formulated a little earlier. In the summer of 1993, Barak asked Maj.-Gen. Ilan Biran to prepare a paper on the border that the IDF should recommend.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Order of Canada

OTTAWA — Rabbi Gunther Plaut, senior scholar at Holy Blossom Temple, has been promoted to the highest level within the Order of Canada. In an announcement last week, Governor General Adrienne Clarkson stated that Rabbi Plaut has been elevated to the rank of companion of the Order for his work in human rights and race relations.

Clarkson announced 81 appointments to the Order, including several other Jewish Canadians.

Named as an officer is Ruth Goldbloom of Halifax for voluntarism.

Named as members are Irving Gerstein of Toronto for voluntarism; Jack Hirsh of Hamilton for health care; Charles Pachter of Toronto for visual arts; Seymour Schulich of Toronto for philanthropy; Benjamin Shapiro of Ottawa for protective service; and Shirley Sharzer of Ottawa for communications.

An investiture ceremony will take place at Rideau Hall in the coming months.

Quebec Writer Honoured

MONTREAL — Several well-known French writers recently paid tribute to Sephardi Quebec novelist and essayist Naïm Kattan at a symposium in Paris on Kattan's works. Born in Baghdad in 1928, Kattan immigrated to Canada in 1954 after completing his literary studies in Paris. He is the author of some 30 works, several of which have been translated into other languages. The recent tribute was organized by the Centre culturel canadien de Paris.

ISRAEL

Sex Allegations

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem police are investigating allegations of sexual misconduct by an instructor at a large Jerusalem yeshiva. The probe comes amid reports that senior rabbis at the seminary tried to cover up the affair and prevent students from filing complaints.

Palestinian Parliament

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority is reportedly constructing a parliament building in an Arab suburb of Jerusalem. Construction at the site in Abu Dis began nearly two years ago, according to the Israeli daily Ha'aretz. Palestinian officials say the building is intended as a cultural centre.

Israel's Population Boom

JERUSALEM — Israel's population will be between 8.2 million and nine million in the year 2020, the Central Bureau of Statistics announced recently. The figure will include one million people over the age of 65, double the current number, the bureau added. It based its forecast on the last census and on recent demographic trends.

Yeltsin Visits

JERUSALEM — Former Russian president Boris Yeltsin met with Israeli officials in a Jan. 7 meeting hosted by President Ezer Weizman. Yeltsin, making a three-day visit to the region to mark the first Russian Orthodox Christmas of the new millennium, responded that Russian officials "have put an end" to anti-Semitism.

WORLD

Man Admits Arsons

LOS ANGELES — A man charged with killing a gay couple in California admitted setting fire to a California synagogue last summer. Benjamin Matthew Williams told reporters during a jailhouse interview that he set the fire and planned attacks on two other Sacramento-area synagogues with help from other white supremacists.

Putin Urged on Wallenberg

NEW YORK — A leading Jewish organization is urging the U.S. government to pressure Russia to help resolve the longtime mystery of Swedish war hero Raoul Wallenberg's disappearance into Soviet custody in 1945. At a luncheon here last Tuesday and in an advertisement in the New York Times the previous day, the New York-based American Jewish Committee called on the United States to "seek the cooperation of acting Russian President [Vladimir] Putin to fully open the Soviet-era archives and reveal the truth."

Jewish Leader Elected

BERLIN — A Holocaust survivor who works as a Dusseldorf theatrical agent has been elected president of the German Jewish community. Last Sunday's election of Paul Spiegel, 62, by the nine-member executive board of the Central Council of Jews in Germany came after his predecessor, Ignatz Bubis, died last August. Also last Sunday, French Jewish leader Henri Hajdenberg was elected head of the European Jewish Congress, a post Bubis also held before his death.

Assad's Special Toilet: A Spy Story

LONDON — Syrian President Hafez al-Assad may well have been impressed to discover that a toilet had been built for his exclusive use when he visited Jordan last February for the funeral of King Hussein.

He would not have known, according to a report in the London Sunday Times this week, that the toilet had been specially created by the Israeli intelligence agency Mossad and its Jordanian counterpart.

What made the toilet special, the report added, was that the outlet did not lead to a drain, but rather to a specimen jar.

Minutes after the Syrian leader used the toilet, the specimen jar containing a sample of his urine was sped to a hospital in Israel, where a team of pathologists and biochemists was waiting to analyze it.

According to the report, the medical analysts concluded that Assad, who has had a heart attack and now suffers from diabetes and cancer, does not have long to live.

"The latest Israeli assessment," the paper reported, is that Assad "is living on borrowed time and that a potential partner for peace may be lost."

Poll finds 54% support funding for religious schools

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario Jewish leaders and activists are putting a positive spin on a new poll that shows 54 percent support for public funding of religious-based, independent schools.

The poll results and the creation of the Coalition for Justice in Educational Funding, an alliance of faith-based groups, were announced at a Toronto press conference last Monday morning.

The coalition, which includes Muslims, Sikhs, Armenians, Seventh-Day Adventists, the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools and the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education – an arm of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, was set up to pressure Queen's Park to address the historic Nov. 5 finding by the United Nations human rights committee, which said Ontario discriminates by funding Catholic schools and not other religious-based education systems.

The UN gave Canada until Feb. 3 to say how it will correct the unfairness.

CJC Ontario region chair Keith Landy and other coalition members released the results of a poll conducted by Environics Research Group, which found that 54 percent of respondents agree Ontario should fund all religion-based independent schools, given that the province is constitutionally obliged to continue funding the Catholic system.

The Focus Ontario poll, which Environics conducts quarterly, surveyed 1,018 adults across the province in late December. The question on school funding, paid for by the coalition, found that 43 percent of respondents said Ontario should not use tax dollars to fund private, faith-based schools. The other three percent either did not know or said the answer depends on other factors.

Compared to the overall figure of 54 percent, support for funding among men only was 48 percent, while 60 percent of women were in favour if it.

When broken down along education levels, those with a university education were the least in favour of public funding.

Among political preferences, support for funding among Liberals was 57 percent; among Conservatives, 43 percent; and 63 percent among New Democrats.

The poll's findings are "a strong reflection of support" for funding independent and private schools, Landy told The CJN. "But this isn't a numbers game. This poll gives a level of comfort" to those seeking tax dollars for their schools.

Arieh Waldman, the Toronto Jewish parent who brought the funding case to the UN, called the poll's results "very positive," given that since the UN ruling, there have been many public statements, including from Ontario's education ministry, indicating that the status quo would be kept.

Waldman and Ontario Parents for Equality in Education Funding (OPEEF) are planning a rally the evening of Saturday, Feb. 5, to protest the current funding structure.

York University professor Anne Bayefsky, who represented Waldman before the UN panel, also called the poll results positive, but said its question should have pointed out that the UN has found Canada to be in violation of its international human rights commitments.

There were, however, several "prompts" in the poll, one of which did note the UN ruling. The

The 15th of Shvat is here!

Our thoughts of Tu b'Shvat tend to galvanize around a variation of the scene in the photo set into this column: children – usually very young and smiling – planting trees, or simulating the planting of trees, but always learning something significant in relation to the planting of trees. And in Jewish law, tradition, history and folk-ways there is indeed a great deal that is significant about trees.

The first words and pages of the Torah introduce us to the concepts of the tree of knowledge and the tree of life. The very use itself of the word "tree," irrespective of its many layers of literal and metaphorical interpretation, implants into our deep psyches and human frameworks, the importance of the "tree."

Among the laws that Moses reviews for his people before they cross into the Promised Land and before he takes his final leave of them is the prohibition against destroying the trees of a city that is being besieged. (Deut. 20:19)

In their understanding of the perfect beauty in God's bounteous earth, our ancient rabbis even decreed that we should recite a blessing when we see trees in blossom.

The 15th day of Shvat, (Tu b'Shvat) was declared by our sage Hillel as an "administrative" designation in the first century BCE to enable farmers to fix an "age" to the trees they planted. The age of the tree was significant for a number of reasons, among them that it identified those trees from which fruit could be collected for either personal or communal use.

Scholars speculate that Hillel selected the 15th day of the month of Shvat for two reasons: (a) by that time of the year – in Shvat – most of the annual rainfall will have already fallen in Israel and the almond tree, which, more than any other tree has come to symbolize the holiday of Tu b'Shvat will have started to blossom, and (b) by that time of the month – its mid-point – the moon is at its full beauty, just as it is for Pesach and Sukkot.

The date, Tu b'Shvat was already part of the calendar and part of the national identity when our ancient forebears were expelled from their land.

As we wandered the territory of our dispersion, we continued to commemorate the date as if we were still planting, counting and identifying trees in Israel. The date became a holiday and the holiday yet another torch of collective, national memory reinforcing the sense of peoplehood and illuminating the never-forgotten path back to the homeland.

Over the ages, the holiday evolved to accommodate the uniquely pressing needs of the times. Thus in the 16th century, the kabbalists of Safed developed a Tu b'Shvat seder and liturgy that became the standard celebration for many Jews.

A century later the Jews of eastern Europe marked the holiday by eating produce from the Holy Land.

In the late 19th century, with the beginning of the return to Zion by the first modern Jewish farmers, the holiday became the pragmatic rallying symbol for the revival of the land of Israel which historians and eyewitness travellers at that time attested was, in the main, desolate.

Ever since then, Tu b'Shvat in Israel has been celebrated with children's songs and with tree-planting ceremonies. The photo to the left is a Diaspora echo of those celebrations.

Over the past few decades, again, in response to the pressing needs of our times, the holiday has been acquiring an expanded significance as a gateway to a deeper sensitivity towards the environment.

Recently, The Jewish Publication Society added a Tu b'Shvat Anthology volume entitled Trees, Earth and Torah to its seven-volume Jewish Holidays series.

The remarkable reverence for life that finds its symbol in our attachment to the planting of trees is poignantly captured in the famous exchange between an old Jewish farmer and the Roman General Hadrian recorded in the Talmud. Hadrian, of course, was the general who vanquished the Jews during the Bar Kochva revolt and razed Jerusalem.

He observed the old man planting a fruit tree and asked him why he was doing so, it being rather obvious that the old man would live neither to see the tree grow nor to eat of its fruit.

The "lowly" old Jewish farmer answered the all-powerful, ruling Roman general that he planted for the generations that were yet to come, just as early generations had planted for him.

Tu b'Shvat is here tomorrow night. Remember the Land from which the holiday originates; remember our debt to the generations that came earlier; and remember, too, our obligations to the generations yet to come. MBD

UJA Federation seeks to integrate Russian-born Jews

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When you look at Toronto's Russian Jewish community, estimated at 30,000 to 35,000 people, "you can count on one hand the number of people integrated into the larger Jewish community," says Igor Korenzvit.

Korenzvit, a member of UJA Federation's integration committee, believes past attempts at integration have failed.

The committee hopes to change that with its recently announced funding of nine organizations that will offer programs to help meet the need.

The programs represent the Jewish community's response to an appeal from the integration committee to UJA Federation affiliates in fall 1999.

The grantees were chosen on the basis of their focus on integration, the potential number of people who would benefit and the cost of doing the program, Korenzvit said.

Funnelling the requests through the committee, which will receive progress reports from grantees, means that, for the first time, the community is making a co-ordinated effort to facilitate integration.

Korenzvit said he found the response "very encouraging."

"It allowed us to find the best organizations to do the best things, and to do it more efficiently."

The groups were selected from about 15 applicants to receive one-year grants totalling $265,500. The allocations, which represent a reorganization of the existing budget, do not preclude other budgetary items such as tuition subsidies for Russian students, noted Perry Romberg, of UJA Federation. "It's part of the pool."

Romberg estimates almost half the money will fund programs for youth. He noted that the programs are aimed not only at newcomers, but also at longtime residents who've "never connected."

The grantees and the amounts they are receiving, are:

• Ameinu, a volunteer group based at the Orthodox girls' high school Bais Yaakov. The group, which is receiving a $20,000 allocation, does outreach, including Jewish holiday celebration, to Russian families;

• the Bathurst Jewish Centre, $23,000, for its Maccabi Sports Club, which includes an informal Jewish education component;

• Beth Tikvah Synagogue, $5,000, for Shabbatons aimed at Russian families;

• Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, $10,000, for the Russian version of its Doing Jewish program;

• Jewish Campus Services, $17,500, for its York University-based club for Israeli students, among whom are Russian-born students who came to Canada via Israel;

• the Jewish Russian Community Centre, $120,000, for adult education and for its Hebrew school, serving 180 children;

• Jewish Vocational Services, $35,000, for a mentoring and career planning program aimed at immigrant youth and adults.

• Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, $30,000, for a joint JIAS-B'nai Brith Youth Organization program aimed at Russian teens, and for a Jewish holiday series;

• Maon Noam, $5,000, a fledgling Russian-Jewish synagogue and educational organization.

None of the organizations received the full amount they requested, Korenzvit said. "We just didn't have enough money to give away. These organizations are putting their own investment into the program."

Nine organizations with different approaches to integration will give the Russian community more options, Romberg noted. "I think that's the real strength of this."

C.D. Howe Institute gets first Jewish president

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jack Mintz is the new president and chief executive officer of one of Canada's most important think-tanks.

The 48-year-old University of Toronto economics professor has headed the C.D. Howe Institute – an independent, non-profit economic and social policy research institution – since last September.

He is the first Jew in that position.

Named after a former federal cabinet minister, the institute has a reputation for providing balanced analyses of issues of national interest ranging from monetary policy to inter-provincial trade.

"We have had a significant impact on public policy," said Mintz in an interview at his office at the U of T's Joseph L. Rotman School of Management.

Thanks to its publications and round-table forums, which attract members of Canada's intellectual elite, the institute has exerted considerable influence on a whole host of issues, including Canada's ongoing constitutional crisis.

The federal government's clarity bill on Quebec separation, he said, was inspired by an essay published by the institute.

And current debates concerning fiscal planning, the Canada-to-the-U.S. brain drain and the long-term viability of Canada's pension plan have also been sparked by its policy initiatives.

"Our stuff gets read," said Mintz. "Our publications could be put into a minister's briefing book.

Jack Mintz

"We're totally non-ideological," he added. "We try to find solutions to problems."

A former advisor to Finance Minister Paul Martin, Mintz is the Arthur Andersen Professor of Taxation at the U of T, which he joined in 1989 after an association with Queen's University in Kingston.

He is an authority on public economics (the study of expenditures and taxes in government) and fiscal federalism (the relationship between the federal government and lower levels of government).

As president of the institute, Mintz will focus on fiscal and monetary policy (tax and government debt), economic growth and innovation (education and pensions) and social policy (housing for the poor, child tax benefits and health care).

As well, he will deal with international policy (trade and immigration) and governance and public institutions (parliamentary democracy and fiscal federalism).

Since his appointment last autumn, Mintz has spent much of his time at the institute's downtown office, reserving one full day for teaching.

He teaches post-graduate courses on taxation, micro and public economics and public finance.

Asked whether Canada's tax laws are in need of reform, Mintz said that while Canada has a relatively fair regime in some ways, it lacks a graduated, progressive taxation system.

The reason for that is government clawbacks. "That isn't fair," he observed.

Born and raised in Edmonton, Mintz is the son of Clara and David. Clara was director of Jewish Family Service, while David was a dentist. Their other son, Bruce, is a lawyer in Edmonton.

At the University of Alberta, Mintz started off as a history major, but switched to economics in his second year.

"I've always been interested in public policy, and economics is an integral part of it."

Mintz received an MA degree and a doctor of philosophy from Queen's and the University of Essex in Britain, respectively.

Apart from his regular duties, he has served as a consultant for the World Bank, International Monetary Fund and the governments of Ontario, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

And when tax time rolls around, he personally fills in the forms for his wife, children and parents.

Mintz's children, Avi and Gaela, are students at the U of T. He is married to Eleanor Schwartz of Ottawa, a part-time student enrolled at York University's Jewish studies program.

An avid squash player, Mintz is involved in Jewish communal affairs. He was president of Kingston's Jewish Community Council. And now, in Toronto, he sits on two boards – the Jewish Federation and the Board of Jewish Education.

Shame

It is not certain whether 18-year-old Joshua Fleuelling would have, in any event, survived the cardiac arrest last Friday night had he been admitted to the first emergency department to which he was brought by ambulance in the Greater Toronto Area. What is certain is that the closest emergency department, the one to which ambulance attendants logically tried to admit him, did not admit him. What is certain is that the ambulance attendants were then forced to travel for an additional 18 minutes to find an other hospital for the gravely ill 18-year-old. What is also certain, alas, is that the lad died a few hours after the ambulance was turned away from the first hospital.

It is to our everlasting shame as a society that this happened.

The health system needs urgent repair.

The prime minister and the premiers should immediately convene a health care summit to begin the process of mapping out a short-term and long-term rescue plan for that system. The design of the plan should involve the most experienced and most devoted health care minds in this country. Solutions are not beyond Canadians' abilities to devise.

Canadians are ill served by the constant finger-pointing, name-calling and blame-casting of our elected officials. It is time that they set aside partisan concerns and embraced instead, universal concerns. Such a travesty must never be allowed to happen again.

The chief justice

Last week, Justice Beverley McLachlin became the chief justice of Canada's Supreme Court, assuming the chief's mantle from Antonio Lamer who "conveyed" it to her with dignity, grace and good wishes. We too extend our good wishes to Chief Justice McLachlin.

She becomes the court's "leader" at a time of deepening economic, demographic and sociological change. Familiar Canadian economic institutions are being hammered by globalization; globalization is being driven by rapid-fire technological "progress;" and technological progress has proved itself to be an impatient, unyielding agent for societal transition. In this heaving sea of transition, Canadians will need the Supreme Court to be an instrument of stability, infusing values of humanity and justice into a civilization more reliant each day on machines.

When Yitro, Moses' father-in-law, observed how daunting were his son-in-law's judicial responsibilities, he urged him to devise a judicial system whose cornerstone would forever be the integrity of the individual judge. Four characteristics, he suggested, were indispensible for the ideal judge: ability (a trait combining reliability and strength); God-fearingness (always striving to do the moral thing); truth; and a hatred of corruption. Some 2,500 years later, Maimonides "fleshed out" Yitro's list somewhat by prescribing seven characteristics for the ideal judge: wisdom, humility, fear of God, disdain of gain, love of truth, love of the other, and a good reputation.

Canada's new chief justice, Beverley McLachlin, qualifies for both lists. May God crown her efforts with success.

CAPTIVE IN IRAN

The government of Iran still holds the following members of the Jewish community as prisoners. Each is a universe of life and existence unto his own. And each has a name. Let us not forget them.

A mother's plea

On the subject of organ transplant, we are praying for a 180-degree change in established attitudes. Changing is never easy. Organ transplant surgery is long past the stage of experimentation. The technology, the skill of the surgeons is exemplary. The results are life giving. Sharing is life giving. There is so much we can and should do for one another.

I applaud the openness and the opinions expressed by the rabbis, physicians and organ recipients. I plead with each person to discuss this serious and vital issue with their families, their friends, everyone.

It is a subject I am passionate about. I am the grateful mother of a dear son who has had a successful liver transplant. Baruch haShem. He is well, happy, productive and full of life. How can one ever properly thank a family who, in the midst of their own tragedy, thought of others? My way to say thank you is to speak to any who will give me a moment.

The Multiplant and Retrieval Unit says: "Please don't take your organs to heaven; heaven knows we need them here."

Signing your organ donor card is only a beginning. Telling your family that this is your wish is the best assurance that things will proceed as you would like them to, because you will not be there to defend your decision. Let us offer some hope to those on the growing, long list, waiting for a chance for life. I plead with you to do it now, today. Talk to your family. Change your mind and theirs, please.

Re: Seeking civic minded people (CJN, Dec. 23). The writer of this letter is quite right that the Jewish victims of World War II residing in Canada have been overlooked for the last 52 years. Our concerns and needs have not been met by any existing organization. The third largest Holocaust survivor community in the world resides in Canada. Why is it that no organization or survivors' group undertook the responsibility to proceed to register Canadian Jewish survivors?

Judging by the enormous number of registrations coming in daily, the founding of our organization was long overdue. Our pro-tem executive and board are comprised of survivors who are involved as volunteers in their respective communities. We are committed to disseminating any information pertaining to and benefiting Holocaust survivors.

Upon completion of the registration process, we will initiate a Canada-wide election for the executive and board. Any registered survivor will be eligible to run for office.

York sponsors Israeli dig

As reported in The CJN, this fall's Leonard Wolinsky Lectures on Jewish Life and Education at the York University Centre for Jewish Studies included a talk by Dr. Aren Maier, director of the archeological dig at Tel Gath in Israel.

Readers will want to know that the dig is a joint project of our Centre at York and the Martin (Szusz) Department of Land of Israel Studies at Bar-Ilan. The co-ordinator of the dig is Prof. Carl Ehrlich of York.

As the North American partner in the dig, York offers a four-week credit course in field study at the site. Last summer, students in the course came from universities across North America, and we are expecting an even larger registration this year. Interested students should contact Ehrlich through the Centre for Jewish Studies.

Perspectives

Reform of United Nations falling short

By DAVID H. GOLDBERG

Recent articles in the Globe and Mail and the Toronto Star have commended Canada for "making its mark" during the just-completed first year of its two-year stint as a non-permanent member of the United Nations Security Council.

Specifically, the articles praised Ambassador Robert Fowler for using Canada's seat at the Security Council table to promote some key elements of Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy's plan to reform the UN system. Nevertheless, as the Globe and the Star reviews pointed out, important Canadian accomplishments were counterbalanced by the difficulty Axworthy and Fowler have had in trying to promote other features of their reformist agenda, including the following:

• encouraging member states to better "prioritize" the issues they address (i.e., recognizing that not all issues placed before UN agencies automatically or necessarily have equal weight, and ensuring that UN responses to issues are both proportionate and constructive);

• encouraging UN agencies to ensure that issues are dealt with on their own merit, devoid of extraneous political pressures and with full appreciation of the concerns and perspectives of all parties involved; and

• encouraging the UN to dispense with the practice of what Stephen Handelman of the Toronto Star called "insider decision-making," in which crucial decisions affecting peace and security are taken in private consultations involving the Secretary General and the five permanent members of the Security Council – those countries have the capacity to paralyze discussion of a particular issue by threatening to employ their respective vetoes. Even in the General Assembly and UN functional agencies, where the veto does not apply, real decision-making tends to take place in closed consultations among groups of states.

Although neither Axworthy nor Fowler cited examples vis-a-vis Israel to illustrate the UN dysfunctional problems referred to above, each was evidenced in cases of recent treatment by the UN of Israel, involving: the Har Choma controversy; the formation of the International Criminal Court; and Israel's proposed admission into the Western European and Others Group (WEOG) at the UN.

The UN's response to Palestinian complaints about Israeli construction at Har Choma in eastern Jerusalem included the convening of extraordinary "emergency special sessions" of the General Assembly (GA) and calling on Switzerland to organize an unprecedented meeting of the high contracting parties of the Fourth Geneva Conventions to enforce the conventions in what GA documents referred to as "occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem." This was a case study in how the majority of UN member states accorded undue priority to an issue that should have never been brought before the UN for consideration, and how they failed to respond to that issue in a proportionate or constructive manner.

To be sure, Palestinian unhappiness over Har Choma did cause a temporary hiccup in peace talks with Israel; but did the dispute truly warrant the kind of over-reaction it elicited at the UN, especially in comparison to real threats to peace and security and humanitarian crises occurring elsewhere in the world at the same time?

Rather than wasting valuable time and resources adopting biased and unconstructive resolutions over Har Choma, the interests of regional stability would have been much better served had Canada and other GA member states encouraged the Palestinians to activate the bilateral dispute-resolution mechanism built into the Oslo process.

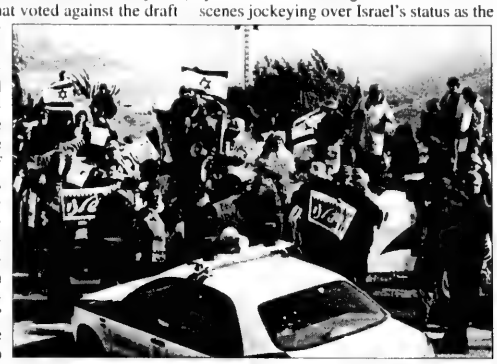
Moreover, the controversial way in which the GA chose to deal with the Har Choma question, by linking it to a series of increasingly offensive resolutions reiterating the GA's longstanding criticism of Israeli activities in the territories and Jerusalem generally, posed a dilemma for Canada. It felt compelled to support the controversial resolutions. In its explaning its vote, Canada expressed strong reservations about those resolutions on both procedural and substantive grounds.

This is certainly not to condone Canada's decision to vote in favour of the GA resolutions ensuing from the Har Choma controversy – for Canada should have joined Israel in opposing these resolutions on principle – but merely to put Canada's decision-making process in context. Moreover, in the end Canada did do the right thing: It boycotted a preparatory meeting of the high contracting parties in Egypt, and then worked vigorously behind the scenes to diminish the adverse effect on the peace process of the meeting of the high contracting parties that occurred in Geneva on July 15, 1999.

However, the very fact that a relatively minor political dispute between Israel and the Palestinians was accorded such disproportionate attention at the General Assembly underscores a fundamental area of continuing dysfunction in the UN's performance, one that Canada has targeted for reform.

Yet another weakness in the UN's performance, one that again directly involved Israel, was highlighted in the dispute surrounding the International Criminal Court (ICC). Though it was a strong advocate of the ICC from the outset, Israel found itself among the handful of countries (led by the United States) that voted against the draft treaty in July 1998.

Israel's opposition was based mainly on the inclusion in the draft treaty, at the insistence of Arab countries, of a clause implying that Jewish settlement activity in "occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem" was a war crime comparable to the Nazi Holocaust and other atrocities.



Protest during the Har Choma controversy

This constituted only the latest instance of well-meaning and important UN initiatives being undermined by overt "politicization," and in which the legitimate interests and concerns of an affected party (in this case, as in so many other cases, Israel) were discounted, dismissed or completely ignored.

Indeed, decades of excessive politicization on the part of UN agencies, in favour of the Arabs, was one of the major factors contributing to the world body's having no substantive role in the active promotion of Arab-Israeli peace.

Canada was drawn full force into the ICC controversy because a Canadian diplomat chaired the committee mandated to formulate key provisions of the ICC draft treaty. In defence of their position, Canadian officials noted that the article of the draft treaty offensive to Israel had been drawn verbatim from the Fourth Geneva Conventions. They furthermore insisted that the reference to settlement activity in the treaty was so imprecise as to be of little practical significance for Israelis.

Such Canadian efforts to ameliorate Israeli concerns, combined with close cooperation between Canadian and Israeli delegations in finding mechanisms to ensure that this and other potentially problematic provisions of the ICC treaty will not be exploited for frivolous, politically driven purposes, is reassuring. However, the very fact that the formation of an important international institution such as the International Criminal Court was jeopardized by extraneous political pressures served to emphasize yet another persistent area of dysfunction in UN performance that Canada seeks to reform.

A third and final element of Canada's reform agenda still to be fulfilled relates to the "insider decision-making" that has dominated the entire UN system since its formation. Here again, the persistence of this problem was highlighted by the UN's unfair treatment of the State of Israel. Specifically, the continued disgraceful behind the scenes jockeying over Israel's status as the only UN member state denied membership in the influential regional bloc system (in which nominations for most UN committees, including the Security Council, are now vetted) has, in the words of the Toronto Star's Handelman, "made the UN a caricature."

At the opening of the 54th session of the General Assembly last fall, and riding the wave of optimism generated by Prime Minister Ehud Barak's attempts to reinvigorate the peace process, there was a palpable sense that an end to Israel's unique isolation at the UN was in view.

Specifically, the way was apparently being cleared for Israel's admission to WEOG, a regional group comprised of Canada, the United States, Australia and the European Union. With Israel's knowledge, ambassadors from WEOG did meet informally to consider the question of Israel's admission.

But at the end of the day, the necessary consensus was blocked by divisions among the EU members, divisions that seemingly had less to do with the politics of the Middle East than with the concerns of weaker EU members (such as Ireland and Spain) about the adverse effect the admission of one more country into WEOG would have on their interests in being nominated for membership on UN committees.

The absence of progress on the matter of WEOG was disappointing to Israel, which naturally sought an end to its isolation at the UN. However, it should also have been frustrating for Canadian diplomats, who should have accurately perceived Israel's admission to WEOG as an important litmus test of the success of Canadian-led efforts to bring about fundamental reform in the way in which the United Nations goes about its business. Indeed, the concern about UN reform is a new and important area of shared interest between Canada and Israel.

David H. Goldberg is director of research and education for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Opinions

The new revisionists

Lately, whenever Israel comes up for discussion, I am asked what I think of the "new revisionists." By that, the questioners mean two major works that have recently appeared.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

One is by Avi Shlaim, professor at St. Antony's College in Oxford, and the other is by Benny Morris of Ben-Gurion University in Beersheva.

Both books are radical revisions of early Zionism and the history of Israel's founding, but both are quite different in making their points.

Shlaim, so it seems to me, has more in mind than establishing the facts of Israel's and Zionism's past history. His perspective appears to be influenced by a personal agenda, while Morris's strikes me as more universal, even though he too, like any historian, brings his personal view to the selection and interpretation of facts.

The reader of Shlaim's book is likely to find that Israel fits Ernest Renan's definition of a nation: "A group of people united by a mistaken view about the past and a hatred of their neighbours."

His book, The Iron Wall, presents the story in a distinctly partisan light: The early Zionists were something less than idealists; the depiction of Israel, and especially early Israel, as a victim of aggression, is a misreading of history; and if there is a culprit to be found in the endless struggle between Israelis and Arabs, it is the former rather than the latter who are to be faulted.

Morris, on the other hand – while in many cases getting hold of the same facts that Shlaim uses – draws more muted conclusions. According to him, the history of any state has many contradictory aspects that need to be presented without fear and without hiding unpleasant parts.

There is no question in my mind that by the time this article appears, enemies of Israel will have made considerable use of both books. That does not disturb me, given the rhetoric that all along has prevailed in Arab publications.

As for Israel, it is today a nation which in every respect has matured – and I am confident that it will know how to deal with the tarnishing of earlier perceptions. It is a strong country and no longer needs the idea that it has been victimized from the very beginning.

But somehow Diaspora Jews still seem to need that perspective. They see an anti-Semite behind any criticism that is levelled against us.

We have been brought up with the idea and belief that the early Zionists were pure visionaries and that nascent Israel was bathed in the light of innocence.

Yet, long after Israelis came to know that there were Arabs who also lived in the land, or that there have been bitter chapters in Israel battlefield history, Diaspora Jews are still hanging on to earlier tales and excuses.

As for me, I can take a dose of historical revisionism. In no ways does it dim my love for the people of Israel and my admiration for what the state has accomplished in its five decades of existence.

I do not have to be proud of everything that has been done, but will love it because it is my family.

Myths surround Jewish singles

Myth is a powerful thing. A story or vision of perfection people need to believe in, to strive for and maybe to attain one magical day. When religion is described as myth or as having a mythology, members of that religion take offence and rightly so. Religion is not a collection of myths. But the same can't be said for culture.

Jennifer Fox on campus in Halifax

Traditions we maintain, from the foods we eat to the clothes we wear, are parts of the culture of Jews, not of the religion itself.

In this culture we have our own share of myths. One in particular becomes increasingly important as a Jewish female works her way through her 20s – the myth of the nice Jewish boy – some mythical man that every Jewish girl is striving to meet and marry, so that together they will create the next generation of nice Jewish boys.

Where did this myth begin? I understand the arguments and reasons for marrying a fellow Jew; this isn't my question. But I want to know who decided the title. Why should he be nice rather than smart or sexy or funny? Why doesn't the myth describe him as a good Jewish boy?

On the flip side, I'm sure mothers everywhere beg their sons to find a nice Jewish girl. Nice is a word that's tossed about so easily but doesn't really mean anything. The coffee table in my parents' living room is nice. So is the song I heard on the radio the other day. And so are my friends. I describe them as "nice people."

So we Jewish females are out in the world armed with this ideal of a nice guy, without knowing what the word means or how to recognize him.

The other dilemma becomes, where does one meet a nice Jewish boy?

It begins with our mothers. There exists a network of Jewish mothers whose fondest wish is to unite their single sons and daughters. Put them together and see what happens. I, thankfully, have only heard of these modern-day matchmakers through second-hand accounts.

For those mothers with children of different ages than their friends' children, there is an alternate route in the quest for the nice Jewish mate. Jewish organizations are the perfect places to seek out a significant other.

Though Jewish youth and adult groups have mandates that speak of promoting Jewish identity and religion, I have a sneaking suspicion that organizers have their fingers crossed that a few people might "hit it off."

This is what irks me when I attend schmoozes, or as they are commonly known in Toronto circles, "Jew dos." I go to meet people in general, but there is this pressure to go and find my life partner or at least a date. When I'm asked about an event by family and friends, their innocent, "So how was it?" rings in my head as, "So did you meet anyone?"

Maybe the tiny part of me that's a romantic thinks I'll meet some wonderful guy by accident when I crash into him at the library or by gazing across a classroom. Mixers and dances are so forced. There's an invisible sign over the door reading: Here's the selection, now get to it.

Where's the romance in that? Where's the stuff Jane Austen novels are made of?

I don't want to search for the mythical nice boy. I don't want to feel the pressure when I step into the room at a Jewish event. I don't want a friend of the family to tell me about some wonderful nephew or third cousin who would be perfect for me.

Most of all, I don't want to be described as nice.

Students raise glasses to needy

Jewish student agencies across the continent have spent the past couple of years sweating, trying and hoping to get Jewish students "doing Jewish."

Erica Horn on campus in Montreal

Through my involvement at the Hillel Jewish Student Centre in Montreal, I have noticed that it is not enough to plan run of the mill activities such as Shabbat dinners, Torah study classes and food drives. The programming must be innovative in order to attract the attention of those who would not ordinarily want to become involved.

Our Shabbat dinners, therefore, have themes based on the cultures of other countries, and offer cuisine such as Chinese, Italian or Middle Eastern. Instead of handing out Israeli flags to demonstrate our pride in Israel, we have embarked upon an Israeli-Canadian flag patch campaign. Our parties at downtown clubs aren't on random dates but rather tend to coincide with Jewish holidays such as Purim.

There is an annual Peanut Butter and Jam drive, where students assist in the assembly and distribution of the sandwiches. We have a basketball tournament and ski weekend Shabbatons.

For students involved in the planning of Jewish student centre programs, it often appears that the hardest part is coming up with the innovative activity and not so much getting students to participate.

Hillel and Kedma are undertaking a new project this semester, one that I think accurately reflects the immense amount of thought put into 21st-century Jewish student programming and offers a vision for the future.

First I offer a prelude to underline the significance of the project: I dream of the middle of the night when I can roll over to check the time on my alarm clock and not have to put my glasses on in order to read the time. Or the day when I don't have to shower with my glasses on in order to distinguish the shampoo bottle from the liquid body wash.

The gift of 20/20 vision is one many people take for granted, but perhaps even more crucially, so is people's ability to afford eyeglasses. Recognizing the high costs associated with poor vision, LensCrafters and Lions Clubs have spearheaded a project that delivers free eye examinations and recycled glasses to those who cannot afford them. Hillel and Kedma have chosen to become involved.

Having inherited the poor eyesight gene from both my parents (they have definitely made better contributions to my genetic makeup), and having had to wear glasses since Grade 5, I am not only aware of the cost of eyewear but have also realized for some time that my old glasses just sit in my cupboard and serve absolutely no purpose. I never threw them away because I knew it was a shame, but I also never knew who could possibly use glasses with my prescription.

When the social action committee at Hillel decided on this project, I was excited that my old frames would finally be put to some use, and even more importantly, would go to people who really needed them and could not afford them.

The concept of tikkun olam, repair of the world, often associated with tzedakah and charity, is number 1 on the agenda of many Jewish agencies. Students have become accustomed to the typical food drives and clothing drives. As essential as these activities may be, they are not wowing or different enough to get students excited and involved.

Hillel and Kedma's commitment to undertake the collection of old glasses, with the help of LensCrafters and Lions Clubs, reflects the importance of the perpetuation of creative Jewish programming. It not only creates a new and vital rapport between Jewish student organizations and other agencies but also encourages the participation of a broader number of students.

As the new millennium begins, I think we should raise our glasses to this project and other innovative and creative Jewish student programming of the future.

The Kirshner File

After 25 years, a reporter looks back

Twenty-five is a nice, round number and, for me, it signifies the passage of time and an anniversary. Twenty-five years ago last October, when I joined The Canadian Jewish News, it was a broadsheet, smaller in terms of staff, resources and circulation. I was leaner, had a shock of thinning brown hair and sported nifty sideburns.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

It all seems so long ago, the flower of my youth, and yet the years have flowed by quite rapidly.

Ralph Hyman, the third editor, who passed away in 1989, hired me. Since then I have worked for and with three editors: Maurice Lucow, Patricia Rucker and, since December 1994, Mordechai Ben-Dat.

Looking back, I count myself rather fortunate. I have met interesting people – from presidents and prime ministers to writers and scholars – and I have travelled on assignments, having been to countries ranging from Israel, Egypt and Syria to Argentina, Singapore and Greece. In short, I am doing what I like best and getting paid for it. Can anyone ask for more?

The first story I wrote for The Canadian Jewish News appeared on March 22, 1974, when I was a freelancer and still toiling away unhappily as a technical writer. It was a report on Abraham Schenker, a Jewish Agency official who warned that Israel faced enormous political and public relations problems in the wake of the 1973 Yom Kippur War (a conflict I had glimpsed fleetingly on the Golan Heights as a special correspondent for the Tel Aviv-based magazine New Outlook).

In the intervening years, my life as a reporter has been inextricably bound up with Israel, its array of personalities, and the Jewish world.

Shortly before joining the paper, I covered a speech by Menachem Begin, the courtly Israeli opposition leader. "The Palestinians? Who are they? They are Arabs living in our country," he declared, seemingly oblivious to the ferment in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Begin also thought Israel should not evacuate "defensive positions" in the Sinai Peninsula. Who could have foreseen that, as prime minister, he would set that very process into motion?

In the summer of 1975, when my first daughter, Mia, was six months old, I became the first writer on a North American English language Jewish newspaper to report from Syria. But prior to that, in Cairo, I interviewed Egyptian diplomats who claimed that Egypt was psychologically ready for peace with Israel; spoke to a sad-sack Jewish dentist who had been imprisoned during the Six Day War; and visited the breached Bar-Lev Line, littered with the detrius of war: Israeli tanks and armoured personnel carriers which had been knocked out in fierce battles.

I arrived in Damascus late at night and checked into the gloomy Orient Palace Hotel in the centre of the city. The following day, I started my round of interviews with Syrian government officials, all of whom expressed surprise at my presence. On a tour of a Palestinian refugee camp, my hostess blithely told me that the Palestinians would "drink (my) blood" if they knew I was Jewish. In Kuneitra, which had been reverted to Syrian control in 1974, I peered at Israeli bunkers wreathed in barbed wire just 50 metres away. How surrealistic! Back in Damascus, I contacted Jews, some of whom claimed, disengenuously, that the plight of Syrian Jewry was nothing but a Zionist smokescreen.

After five days, I was asked obliquely by a Ministry of Information functionary to leave Syria. Branded a persona non grata, I boarded a bus for Amman. I was glad to leave. The atmosphere had been oppressive. By comparison, Jordan was an airy outpost of freedom. In Amman, a taxi driver and I chatted in Hebrew, our only common language.

Returning to Canada after a stopover in Israel, I interviewed the flamboyant Ezer Weizman, who predicted a war with Syria within two years. He was not the only politician who got it wrong. In an appearance in Toronto, Moshe Dayan, the former defence minister, said glumly that Israel's 1974 disengagement agreement with Egypt would not advance the cause of peace. Ibrahim Abu-Lugod, a Palestinian official posted to the United Nations, predicted that the PLO would never negotiate with Israel unless it renounced the Law of Return and let in masses of Palestinian refugees. So much for diktats.

In 1976, I interviewed a local TV celebrity who denied, falsely, that she was Jewish; wrote a series on Soviet Jews in Canada and began another one on high-ranking Jewish civil servants in Ottawa; continued writing Mideast Analysis, a column which still appears; composed a profile on Dave Kozinets, the first Jewish mayor of Arthur, Ontario (population 1,600); profiled a Jewish family who had just arrived from Lebanon; and covered the emergence of Canada's anti-boycott legislation.

The highlight of 1977 was a private trip to West Germany, Poland (my parents' birthplace), Hungary, Bulgaria (my wife Etti's country of origin) and Turkey. These places were uniformly fascinating, but only Auschwitz left an indelible mark. It was the first of several Nazi concentration camps I would subsequently visit throughout Europe.

I went back to Egypt in 1978, amid a euphoric mood that peace was at hand. (Later, in Toronto, Begin said in a speech I covered that he would negotiate with Egypt in good faith until a peace treaty was signed.) In Cyprus, enroute from Cairo, I was laid low by a stomach flu, barely managing to drag myself aboard a plane bound for Tel Aviv. Visiting Yamit, the doomed Israeli settlement in the Sinai, I felt a twinge of sadness.

In June of that year, I toured Morocco, where emigration was fast depleting a venerable Jewish community; and Algeria, where I stumbled upon an abandoned synagogue, filled with torn, dusty prayer books, near the mysterious casbah in Algiers.

Throughout 1979, I wrote about the incipient process of normalization between Israel and Egypt and the collapse of the pro-Western monarchy in Iran. I also visited a group of young, idealistic Canadians at a new moshav in the Negev and a Toronto couple in Kiryat Arba, a West Bank settlement near Jerusalem. In Metulla, I interviewed Saad Haddad, the suave commander of the South Lebanon Army – Israel's proxy – who was to die of cancer.

In Mexico, in 1980, I found a wealthy Jewish community which had adapted without assimilating, as well as the descendants of 16th century Marranos who were fighting, without much success, for recognition as Jews.

Back in Toronto, I interviewed Argentinian journalist Jacobo Timerman, who radiated strength of character; Garth Drabinsky, the prickly showman; Klaus Goldschlag, the newly appointed Canadian ambassador to West Germany who, as a youth, had fled the Nazis; Max Wershof, the first Jew in Canada's Department of External Affairs; and Sydney Pierce, Canada's first Jewish ambassador (assigned to Mexico).

On a cold, snowy day in Ottawa in 1981, I sat in Chief Justice Bora Laskin's chambers. He spoke with great deliberation about his past, his career and the law. Louis Rasminsky, the first Jewish governor of the Bank of Canada, reminded me of an avuncular uncle. Robert Rabinovitch, the current president of the CBC, met me in his capacity as deputy secretary to the cabinet. Robert Rothschild, Canada's first Jewish general (1954), reminisced about his rise in the ranks. Martin Goodman, president of The Toronto Star, was tragically stricken with cancer and had just a few months to live when I talked with him. Dayan, on his last visit abroad prior to his untimely death, was pale and unsteady on his feet.

Nineteen-eighty-one was also the year I went on my first official visit to West Germany. I was impressed by the cleanliness of the cities, the beauty of the countryside, the desire of the people to make amends for the past, and the efforts by the government to right wrongs.

Next week: Part 2.

Jewish poetry

Books
Bernard Baskin

Telling and Remembering, A Century of American Jewish Poetry*, edited by Steven J. Rubin (Oxford, $40.95).

The Art of Blessing the Day*, by Marge Piercy (Random House, $32).

Petrushkin*, by Ron Charach (Ekstasis Editions, $12.95 – paper).

Mixed Blessings*, Shula Robin (Claremont Graphics, $10 – paper).

A perceptive critic once wrote that "poetry is the impish attempt to paint the colour of the wind."

Dylan Thomas asserted that "the world is never the same once a good poem has been added to it."

Telling and Remembering is a wide-ranging anthology that brings together more than 200 poems by 56 American Jewish poets. The subject matter is extensive, distinctively Jewish, and includes such themes as the Holocaust, Israel, the nature of religious faith and beliefs. In this splendid compendium – the best of its kind that I know – the poets "pray to, argue with, rage at and worship God."

Divided into sections titled Mishpocheh (Family), The Chuppah (Marriage), Tikkun Olam (Repair of the World), Toldot, Midrashim (Of History and Interpretation), Tefillah (Prayer), the poems in The Art of Blessing the Day are accessible, sensuous and transformative.

In a poem entitled V'ahavta, Marge Piercy writes, "Heaven and earth watch whether we choose life or choose death./ We must choose life so our children may live./ Be quiet and listen to the still small voice within that speaks in love./ Open to that voice, hear it, heed it and work for life./ Let us remember and strive to be good./ Let us remember to find what is holy within and without."

The poet exalts that "The canopy is the cover of our bed/ where our bodies open their portals wide,/ where we eat and drink the blood/ or our love, where skin shines red/ as a swallowed sunrise and we burn/ in our furnace of joy molten as steel/ and the dream is flesh and flower."

Ron Charach is a Toronto practising psychiatrist whose work has been widely reprinted in medical journals and collections. Petrushkin, his fifth volume of poems, is by turn serious and funny and alive with insight and metaphor.

In Millions of Yahrzeit Candles, the poet remembers his father who like many others smoked cigarettes to their death. "Like them, Pa rolled "pills,"/ stringy tobacco in ultra-thin Vogue papers,/ slim pillars in a barely balanced life,/ and nursed a late-night glass of Coke as he prepared/ for another night-shift in the windowless basement of the high-domed railway station,/ breathing in and out his own smoke/ like the burning bush raging against its confinement/ that he was."

The Review that Kills, means that "Friends gather for a few drinks and memorial reading,/ of the very work that was savaged,/ silently comparing their own poems/ to those of the unsung martyr, dead/ by his own tippy hand, by something/ approaching choice,/ while somewhere, in the lull/ of one more passing season,/ the same devout reviewer reloads –"

At 80, Shula Robin of Toronto thinks of her varied life experiences as Mixed Blessings. In the fourth volume of her poems, she writes sensitively and wisely about simple but universal concerns – family, friends, health, aging, nature, war and peace.

In Aging, she proudly proclaims: "I accept myself/ for who and what I am./ New freedom gained to express/ what I think, what I feel,/ without embarrassment,/ makes me count my blessings,/ rejoicing in the golden years."

The poem Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel and Leah is a heart-rending plea. "We are your mothers, troubled mothers/ who love you and warn you:/ don't lift your arms in anger,/ fighting your brothers and sisters,/ you must live in peace, live and let live,/ to achieve harmony,/ for the Land of Israel and its people/ to blossom, flourish./ The alternative is banishment into a desert,/ wandering forty years plus forty,/ plus forty, plus forty!"

The poet confesses, "I need a refuge/ to rest my battered soul/ from shooting in schools," ... "I am looking for/ a peaceful island under the sun,/ but in our global village/ no travel agent can find one."

The evocative illustrations by Shulamit Steinberg compliment and add meaning to the vibrant poems.

Electronic Jewish magazines

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

You won't find these magazines anywhere – on paper. But they do exist – electronically. Today, electronic Jewish magazines on the World Wide Web. Some of the sites contain original material. Others are summaries of the best Jewish writing out there.

Veteran Net journalist Yori Yanover is the brains behind USAJewish.com which claims to attract 4,000 readers daily [http://www.usajewish.com].

Yanover divides his site into sections, such as News, Jews, Anti-Semites, Culture, Israel, Arabs and Weird. Did you miss the article about 83-year-old Kirk Douglas's bar mitzvah bash (New York Daily News)? Or how a California tavern owner angered Jewish groups when he protested a state law banning smoking in bars by erecting a sign that mimicked a Nazi rant (Sacramento Bee)? You can find an archive of U.S. Jewish stories at [http://www.usajewish.com/scripts/usaj/paper/Index.asp?ColumnID=120].

Where can you find Charles Krauthammer, Michael Medved, Rabbi Mordechai Kamenetzky, George Will and Dr. Laura all together under one Web site? At Jewish World Review, Binyamin Jolkovsky puts less of an emphasis on late-breaking news while favouring a place for provocative opinion and thought [http://www.jewishworldreview.com].

In an interesting article, Judy R. Gruen asks why people are so quick to use the word "fanatic" to describe a commitment to Judaism that differs from that of the rest of their family [http://www.jewishworldreview.com/0100/fanatics.html].

They're not really magazines but you can tap into a couple of news services for the latest news direct from Israel. The Jewish Telegraphic Agency was founded in 1917 and has correspondents in over 30 countries. JTA wire stories are included in Jewish papers around the world, but you can access their coverage directly from their Web site [http://www.jta.org]. For more late-breaking stories, also check out Israel-Wire [http://www.israelwire.com].

TattooJew calls itself the Online Magazine for Jews with Attitude [http://www.tattoojew.com]. Editor Alan Kaufman focuses on Jewish cultural life – and isn't afraid to ruffle a few feathers. Some recent articles include Rock of Ages: The Elusive Jewish Pop Song – "Are there straightforward pop songs with Jewish themes, by artists who aren't primarily comedians? They exist, but it's like looking for the proverbial bottle of Manischewitz in the endless aisles of a Wal-Mart."

Since many of the articles deal with mature themes, this site is geared to an adult audience.

Unless you have a very thick skin, skip to another site – to a site like Jewish Heritage Online Magazine [http:// www.jhom.com]. Every month, this delightful online magazine focuses on a different – and very surprising – Jewish theme combining history, an agadah or two and poetry. Who would dream you could create full editions centred on topics such as Bread, Fire, Rain, Colour, Topsy-Turvy, Crown, David, Moon and the number Seven?

Jewish Life in Poland: PAST, PRESENT & FUTURE

A public lecture by
YALE J. REISNER
Director of Research & Archives
Ronald S. Lauder Foundation
Warsaw, Poland

Sunday, Jan. 23 • 7:30 p.m. • Beth Habonim, 5 Glen Park Ave.

Yale J. Reisner, Director of Research & Archives of the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation, directs the Foundation's Genealogy Project at the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw assisting Jews in documenting their family histories, locating ancestral villages and burial places and tracing living relatives and friends.

The Genealogy Project also helps Polish Jews, who have recently discovered their Jewish roots, explore their heritage. Some (separated from their parents during the Holocaust) are helped to learn their own names, and others to find long-lost relatives.

Many young Poles learn to appreciate their Jewish heritage and reconnect to the Jewish community through the Lauder Foundation's schools and kindergartens, youth activities and adult education programs in Poland.

Sources of strength

This is Marlane Smith's second article about her personal experiences in converting to Judaism. She is a Vancouver freelance journalist, engaged to marry a Jewish man in August 2000. She began converting four months ago.

Guest Voice

I have two sources of strength in my new life as a convert to Judaism and I rely upon them heavily when I'm feeling either insecure about belonging to Judaism, or like too much of an outsider to consider myself Jewish.

The first, perhaps obvious, is my fiancé. Despite his ranking as my number 1 source of courage and strength, he receives short shrift here.

The second is the Book of Ruth. Ruth is a Moabite, an extreme outsider. She belongs to an enemy people who, according to several midrashim I've recently read, are not welcome to marry or grow into intimacy with the Israelites.

The Moabites are considered callous and pitiless, a people who deal in lethal curses. Yet the bond between Naomi and Ruth, the ultimate fantasy of the ideal mother-in-law, daughter-in-law relationship, is strong enough to surmount Ruth's identity as only a Moabite.

Ruth is my strength because she deeply feels a kinship with Naomi and the Israelites. Ruth will not be pushed away and insists on being with Naomi. She states, "Your people shall be my people, and your God my God."

The God Naomi repeatedly names as the source of her desolation and bitterness is the God Ruth prepares to embrace. She changes her identity in a world where it is inconceivable, even perilous, to do so and attaches herself to Naomi – literally clings – not only on the private family level, but also on a larger community level.

Until quite recently, the community level has been a personal stumbling block. I was apprehensive about how Jewish people would react to me calling myself a Jew.

Me – with blond hair and blue eyes – who stuck out in shul not only because of my physical appearance but also because I couldn't read Hebrew and felt awkwardly off-key and self-conscious during the singing of songs and prayers I had never heard.

Most of the above is written in the past tense because that is where I've left those disconcerting feelings of inadequacy: in the past.

I've come to accept the fact that my non-Orthodox conversion won't be acknowledged in certain Jewish circles. My acceptance of that reality is a significant leap because it signals the end of my feeling that I am converting simply for my fiancé or his family. Months into the process, I now feel the only person I am doing the converting for is me. And it feels much more honest.

At the onset of my conversion, my fiancé and I imagined we would be reading the Torah together, learning Hebrew together, and meeting with our rabbi together.

Although we both attend our immersion and conversion classes, the majority of what we envisioned doing collectively is done solely by me. And I prefer it.

I should add that my job as a freelance journalist provides me the pleasure of a flexible schedule; his legal practice requires him to be behind his desk, daily, from morning until dark.

My rabbi tells me I have to own a part of Judaism to feel like I truly belong to the religion. Learning Hebrew, becoming familiar with the Shabbat prayers and songs, and reading the Torah are helpful routes toward a feeling of belonging. But the way I connect closest to an ownership of Judaism is through my blood.

As I've written before, my paternal great-great-grandmother was Jewish. Yes, that's a far-removed branch of my family tree but despite the generation gaps, it still exists and provides a tangible bond for me to grasp. A historical way to own a tiny segment of the religion.

Not only do I want to be Jewish, I feel this branch entitles me to be a Jew and reconnect with my Jewish roots.

Organ transplants

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

Comparative Law

There is a serious shortage of organs for transplant surgery. Only a fraction of patients who need transplants get them, and as of Oct. 31, 1999, there were 66,175 people on waiting lists for organ transplants (Source: United Network for Organ Sharing).

With the hope of motivating more families to donate organs, the State of Pennsylvania has begun to offer $300 towards the funeral expenses of an organ donor. This plan has sparked a great deal of discussion about the morality of buying and selling cadaver organs.

In Halachah, the body of a dead person is treated with enormous respect. The Bible prohibits mistreating any dead body, even the body of an executed prisoner or military opponent (Deuteronomy 21:23; Joshua 8:29). In addition, one is prohibited from deriving any benefit, financial or personal, from a dead body (Avodah Zarah 29b).

According to the Mishnah (Yadayim 4:6), the reason why the Torah considers one who comes into contact with a dead body to be ritually impure (tamei) is to prevent people from fashioning household objects such as spoons from the bones of family members; because dead bodies are ritually impure, it is extremely inconvenient to make regular use of body parts. (It should be noted that the concern of the Mishnah is not an imaginary one; it was not uncommon for sorcerers to use human bones).

There is a great deal of debate among halachic authorities about when death occurs, and at what point one may remove organs from a cadaver. Once death occurs, most opinions maintain that it is a mitzvah to donate organs to save another person's life (e.g., Iggrot Moshe YD II: 174). The prohibition against deriving benefit from a cadaver does not preclude organ donations, because the organ is saving the recipient's life.

However, the question remains: Does the prohibition against deriving benefit from a dead body preclude the sale of cadaver organs?

Dr. Abraham S. Abraham discusses this issue in a recent volume of his series on medical halachah Nishmat Avraham (volume 4, 113-115, 222-223). He argues that the prohibition against gaining benefit from a dead body would prohibit one from selling cadaver organs. He writes that the late Rabbi Shlomo Zalman Auerbach agreed with his approach.

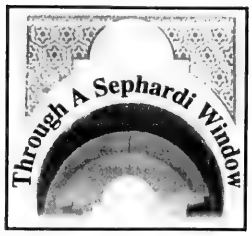
However, at the end of the book, he prints a letter from Rabbi Eliezer Waldenberg, the author of the responsa collection Tzitz Eliezer. Rabbi Waldenberg argues that the family would be allowed to sell the organs. He bases his opinion on a complex responsa by the Chatam Sofer (YD 130). The Chatam Sofer argues that when one does a mitzvah, he does it because he is obligated to do so, and therefore has no other choice (cf. Rosh Hashanah 28a, Rashi s.v. lav). If so, the person is performing the mitzvah because of his obligation, and the money is only an indirect benefit.

Rabbi Waldenberg says the same would be true of organ donations. Assuming it is a mitzvah to donate organs, there is no problem for the family to get paid for the donation, because they are obligated to donate the organs in any case. In most transactions, the seller is obligated to turn over his wares because he has received money from the buyer.

However, in this case, the seller has an obligation to donate the organs even before the transaction takes place. In this case the money received by the family is not the source of their obligation to donate the organs, and therefore this money is not considered a direct benefit from the dead body.

There are two halachic opinions about the acceptability of selling cadaver organs. Some see it as forbidden, prohibited because the family benefits from the sale of a dead body. Others find a loophole to allow this transaction, by viewing the money as peripheral to the donation.

While it may be far simpler to forbid this practice, the enormous scarcity of organ donations may obligate us to look for any way to encourage organ donations, including paying donor families.



Life, times of Sir Montefiore

By AVI BENLOLO

A recent visit to a Sephardi synagogue in London, England, crystallized my understanding of the unequaled impact the legendary Sir Moses Montefiore had on his community.

The old synagogue, tucked away in an inconspicuous urban area of London, has kept the very same chair Montefiore sat on more than a century ago. This gesture symbolizes the congregation's enduring respect for an individual of great stature.

Born in Leghorn, Italy, in 1784, Sir Moses Montefiore became a legend in his time. He devoted himself to combating hatred, persecution and fanaticism. Montefiore exemplified humanitarianism by advocating religious tolerance for all – a milestone for that era. His courage in coming to the aid of the suffering and the oppressed is an ideal he set for others to follow.

While Jewish thought in Europe was increasingly Zionist, particularly under the direction of Theodor Herzl in the late 1800s, Montefiore concentrated his efforts upon immediately improving the lives of fellow Jews around the world. Thus, it seems, he preferred to act spontaneously in order to ease much pain and suffering in the Jewish world.

In 1840, for instance, Montefiore was notified about the Damascus blood libel in which several rabbis were falsely imprisoned on charges that they had killed a child. He quickly travelled to Istanbul to demand that the Sultan free the prisoners.

Montefiore also travelled to Egypt (1840), Russia (1846 and 1872), Morocco (1863) and Romania (1867), to ask the leadership of these nations to treat Jews fairly.

Most of all, however, Montefiore loved Jerusalem, highly respecting the Jews who lived near the ruins of the holy Temple. He initiated the establishment of Mishkenot Sha'ananim, the first Jewish residential neighbourhood outside the Old City wall.

He later built a windmill next to the neighbourhood to help the residents become more self-sufficient, and he attempted to bring industry to the country by introducing a printing press and a textile factory.

Montefiore's rise to prominence in England followed his success on the stock exchange and marriage to Lady Judith Cohen, the daughter of a prosperous merchant who was connected by marriage to the Rothschilds.

Queen Victoria made Montefiore Sheriff of London and Middlesex, knighting him in 1837 upon the occasion of her accession to the throne.

In essence, we can view Montefiore's stature in British politics as indicative of the mostly positive attitude held toward Jews in England at the time. But for Montefiore, the stature he attained was a tool he used to further his non-discriminatory humanitarian missions throughout Europe and the Middle East.

Montefiore's chair that sits in the little London synagogue I visited signifies his lifelong pursuit of fairness, equality and tolerance – and probably much more. As we enter a new century, may we all strive to achieve these virtues.

Restoring Polish cemeteries

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

"Jewish gravestones are fairer than royal palaces." – Talmud (Sanh. 96b).

When the Nazis marched into Staszow, Poland, in 1939, not even the Jewish dead could rest in peace any more. Highly utilitarian, the Germans removed the tombstones from the cemetery for use as paving blocks in the streets.

After the war, the town repaved the streets and put the tombstones into storage, but eventually sold them to a construction company. The tombstones disappeared.

There were no Jews left in Staszow to protest. But sometimes the dead refuse to enter oblivion so easily.

Several years ago workmen laying a gas line in a courtyard uncovered a granite tombstone, four feet high. Jack Goldfarb, a Holocaust survivor visiting from America, came to read the Hebrew inscription. It read, "Itzcha Josef ben Yehudah Leibush Ha-Cohen, died in 1933." Goldfarb, a Staszow native, realized at once that the tombstone memorialized his paternal grandfather.

Since then the courtyard has yielded another 10 gravestones, and Goldfarb has returned to Staszow many times on a self-appointed mission to restore the cemetery and erect a Holocaust memorial.

As such, he is part of a growing grassroots movement among North American Jews, particularly Holocaust survivors and their families, to make repairs at dozens of long-neglected cemeteries across Poland. At many sites, memorials have been erected, fences and gates added, overgrowth cleared away, and gravestones painstakingly cleaned, repaired and resurrected.

Two elderly sisters in Maryland raised $10,000 to restore the cemetery in Dabrowa Bialostocka, where members of their family are buried. At Opatow, about 20 monuments were retrieved from the river and replaced in the cemetery. At Oswiecim (Auschwitz), survivors and local officials gathered many pieces of broken stones and used them to build a memorial wall. Similar walls have risen at Lodz, Lukow, Myslenice, Siedlce and Sandomierz.

On a proportional basis, the destruction of Poland's Jewish cemeteries seems to match or exceed the annihilation of 90 percent of Poland's prewar Jewish population of 3.3 million.

In 1939, an official Polish survey listed 1,415 Jewish communities with populations of 100 or more. Presumably, most had cemeteries. Forty years later, in 1979, another survey listed 434 Jewish cemeteries, only 22 of which were noted to be in good condition. The majority had no visible gravestones. There were other structures – schools, stadiums, warehouses, bus stations and office towers – built over many of the cemeteries.

According to a 1995 survey by the World Monuments Fund, cemeteries in large cities such as Warsaw, Lodz, Bialystok and Krakow generally fared better than their secluded rural counterparts. Even so, only one of six cemeteries in the city of Bialystok has survived – and that one was partially destroyed.

Individuals have intervened to restore cemeteries in Bielsko-Biala, Bilgoraj, Bransk, Chrzanow, Cieszyn, Dabrowa Tarnowska, Dzialoszyce, Gora Kalwaria, Kazimierza Wielka, Kety, Kolbuszowa, Laskarzew, Lomza, Lubaczow, Makow Mazowiecki, Nidzica, Przasnysz, Sanok, Siedlce, Sochaczew, Tarnogrod, Tarnow, Trzebinia, Tyszowce, Wisnicz, Wodzislaw, Zabrze and other places.

As well, private foundations have assisted restorations in Buk, Czestochowa, Kielce, Krosno, Lublin, Sanok and Slubice. Professional conservators have restored monuments in cemeteries in Warsaw, Krakow, Wroclaw, Radom and Lodz.

Many similar efforts are continuing or were recently completed.

Cemetery Notebook: Born in Kalisz in 1863, Samuel Zvi Weltsman travelled through eastern Europe prior to World World I and recorded the epitaphs of some 921 prominent Jewish personalities, buried in 51 communities. Today very few of the cemeteries he visited survive.

A key authority on rabbinical genealogy, Dr. Neil Rosenstein, working with R. Dov Weber, retrieved and annotated Weltsman's notebook from the Jewish National Library in Jerusalem, and republished it as Avnei Zikaron (Stones of Remembrance).

The book and accompanying CD-ROM provide a great deal of information on many important rabbinic families. It is available from the Computer Centre for Jewish Genealogy, 654 Westfield Ave., Elizabeth, N.J. 07208.

UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) wants to hear from you about the growing need for special education services for Jewish students in day and supplementary schools and in the general community.

Tell us about your RECENT experiences of success or dissatisfaction with the current services for children with special learning needs in our community. Please let us know if the situation(s) you describe occurred at a Jewish day or supplementary school, or whether access to appropriate services was available. Please include the following:

- What has worked well for you, your child, your students?
- What has NOT worked well for you, your child, your students?
- What suggestions would you like the BJE to consider?
- Are you a parent, current student, former student, staff, other?

The BJE Special Education Committee will use this and other information to make recommendations regarding service needs, how to deliver them and how to strengthen the current range of services.

Please send us your input no later than January 28th.

33 years later — couple to attend BBYO ball 2000

Harvey and Debbi at BBYA's Sweetheart Ball in February 1967.

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Debbi and Harvey Silver met when they were 18 years old, at a B'nai Brith Young Adults (BBYA) convention in New York, in April, 1966.

She was in a Montreal chapter of BBYA, an offshoot of BBYO (B'nai Brith Youth Organization), called Aspirettes; he was in a Toronto chapter called Aaron Hart.

They became good friends and travelled between Toronto and Montreal visiting each other. By fall, they were engaged.

Debbi vividly remembers the first ball they attended together – BBYA's Sweetheart Ball in February 1967 at the Beverly Hills Motor Lodge Hotel on Wilson Avenue near Jane Street.

"It was beautiful. All the kids were in gowns, the boys were in gorgeous suits. It was so elegant. I was amazed because in Montreal, we didn't have a sweetheart ball."

Thirty-three years and two children later, the couple will be attending the first BBYO ball of the millennium next month – the Beauheart Ball.

"It's like the BBYO prom," explains Dena Libman, BBYO's director of development.

The ball, for BBYO members and alumni, is on Saturday, Feb. 5, at the Thornhill Country Club. The deadline for registration is Wednesday, Jan. 26.

The Messianic Times
Ministry of Interior recognizes Messianic Judaism

An estimated ten thousand Jewish homes recently received this slick missionary publication...

You can fight the efforts of The Messianic Times and dozens of other Christian missionary organizations in the Toronto area that target the Jewish community for conversion. By supporting the counter-missionary work of JEWS FOR JUDAISM, you can help keep Jewish people Jewish.

Endorsed by UJA Federation, Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith, the entire spectrum of synagogues and community groups, JEWS FOR JUDAISM is a vital antidote to the missionary threat.

JEWS FOR JUDAISM's highly acclaimed educational programs, specialized counselling services, literature, tapes and Internet website inspire Jewish pride and commitment and innoculate those at risk.

Reform Jewish leaders back peace talks with Syria

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Members of ARZA Canada and ARZA World Union North America, the Zionist arm of Reform Judaism, have recently demonstrated their support for the Israeli-Syrian peace talks.

At a board meeting of ARZA Canada, held at Holy Blossom Temple, members met with Consul General Meir Romem, and told him that the organization "supports Prime Minister Barak, and his government's efforts to forge a comprehensive peace accord with Syria."

ARZA/World Union North America and the Religious Action Centre of Reform Judaism, which represents 1.5 million Reform Jews in more than 890 congregations across North America, showed its support in an open letter to Barak.

"We want you to know that the opposition you may have seen during your stay in Shepherdstown reflects only a small minority of American Jews…We stand behind you in your historic role of bringing peace to the people of Israel and the Middle East. Peace is Judaism's highest value."

ARZA Canada's board meeting was attended by the rabbis of four Toronto-area congregations including Rabbi Dow Marmur, spiritual leader of Holy Blossom; Harvey Zimmerman, president of Arzenu, the international federation of Reform Judaism; Austen Beutel, chairman of the board of the World Union of Progressive Judaism; and Rabbi Paul Golomb, executive director of the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism.

Romem told the meeting that this is the first time that Israel has the opportunity to complete the cycle of peace with all its neighbors, and that "this will enable us to achieve peace with the rest of the Arab and Islamic world."

'Will enable us to reduce defence budget'

Military superiority, he said, is not only judged by the land a country occupies, but also by whether the country is living in peace. "Strategically, peace with Syria will enable us to reduce our defence budget, and allow shorter IDF service.

"I know how agonizing it will be for residents of the territories to leave their homes, but when Israel completes its peace, it will be the fulfillment of a dream. It will be the greatest day since the establishment of the state."

The combination of peace and economic growth, he said, will guarantee the country's strength, and will help strengthen ties with Jewish communities around the world.

Currently, he said, business start-up in Israel is greater than the whole European community. "We don't know the success rate, but the mere fact that there are so many start-ups, speaks for itself. As well, the number of Israeli companies on NASDAQ is second only to Canada.

"If we do not make peace with Syria, the chances of war are great, and we should not miss the opportunity of making peace with the Arab countries. The alternative is worse. To make peace requires as much courage as to make war."

Syrians will not stay as they are for another 30 years, he said, without making trouble. "They know they can't defeat us, but they can make trouble. With their missiles, they can hit most populated areas."

As for the demonstrations against the recent talks at Shepherdstown, Romem said that opposition is not confined to certain parties. "There are people from every party for and against withdrawal.

"As long as there is peace with the regimes, however, the peace with people will follow."

Reform Judaism planning to boost presence in Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Officials at the 65th Reform biennial convention, held recently in Orlando Fla., announced plans to raise $50 million over the next 10 years, in order to build synagogues and community centres throughout Israel.

Speaking at the convention that attracted more than 5,000 Reform Jews, including about 100 from Canada, Rabbi Ammiel Hirsch, executive director of ARZA/World Union said that $4 million has already been raised towards the 10-year project, and construction permits have been approved.

Rabbi Paul Golomb, executive director, Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, said Canadian Reform Judaism is part of the initiative, with particular focus on Reform kibbutzim north of Eilat, and the development of a Reform community in Modin.

"For years, the issue has been whether there is place for non-Orthodox religious expression in Israel. The movement attracts native Israelis and immigrants from around the world. The need is there, and institutions need to be built."

The Reform community now maintains 25 synagogues, community groups and kibbutzim in Israel, said Rabbi Hirsch. "We know that in every place where we have built a centre, the people have come. They drink up all that we have to offer."

The convention, said Rabbi Golomb, focused on how to transform today's synagogues to meet the congregants' needs, and how to make synagogues more accessible to various groups such as youth, childless couples and empty-nesters.

Eric Yoffie

"As well, synagogue members are better educated and more literate than they were in the '50s and '60s. The demands of the rabbi as scholar, pastor, and CEO of the synagogue have changed," he said.

Nancy Berkovitch, president of the CCRJ, and a member of Temple Israel, the only Reform temple in Ottawa, said she attended the convention, as a Canadian as well as a North American.

"The Union of American Hebrew Congregations is a North American institution, and although we may do things a little differently here, we all went to study and learn. Reform Judaism is liberal, but it is still Torah centred."

The highlight of the convention, she said, was the Friday night dinner and the Shabbat service. "The prospect of having 5,000 Jews in one place is very exciting."

Rabbi Golomb said that Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of UAHC, used Canada as a model in his message about gun control.

"Speaking about the resolution passed at the convention that called on every Reform Jew to contact his senator and demand that gun control be enacted, he [Yoffie] contrasted Americans' sorry record in gun control with that of Canada," said Rabbi Golomb.

In other Canadian news at the convention, Holy Blossom Temple was the recipient of the Irving J. Fain Award for its Out of the Cold program of food and shelter for the homeless.

School funding poll

prompts asked respondents whether they would be more or less supportive of full funding if they knew it would cost less than two percent of the current education budget; if they knew Ontario is the only province to fund Catholic but not other religious schools; and if they knew about the UN ruling.

Simon Rosenblum, director of public policy at CJC Ontario region, said the prompts affected the final poll outcome "only on a marginal basis."

Wayne Levin, director of Parents for Educational Choice, dismissed the poll results as "irrelevant."

"This issue isn't about Catholic schools," he told The CJN. "It's about providing an appropriate environment for every student in Canada."

Levin said he and other Jewish parents in his group are about to form the Ontario Alliance of Jewish Schools as "the true representative organization" to work for fair funding, and to be the liaison between the government and Jewish schools. The inaugural meeting is planned for next month, Levin said.

On Jan. 26 at 7:30, Joe Volpe, member of Parliament for Eglinton-Lawrence, will host a town hall meeting on funding for independent and religious schools. It will take place at Beth Jacob High School for Girls, 410 Lawrence Ave. W.

Volpe has gone on record as saying there are many avenues open to Canada in the wake of the UN finding, despite arguments that education is solely a provincial matter.

On Dec. 22, CJC national president Moshe Ronen led a delegation of representatives in a meeting in Ottawa with Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy to urge Ottawa to work with Ontario and change the province's funding policy.

Samuel Kernerman: A man of three centuries

Senior turns 101 on Jan. 19

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For a man who has lived in three centuries, Samuel Kernerman, who will be 101 years old on Jan. 19, has a simple request.

"I just want to see my great-grandchildren grow up," he said.

He has 28 great-grandchildren.

Interviewed at the Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre veterans wing, Kernerman, a veteran of World War I and a member of the Royal Engineers and of the Jewish Legion that fought in what was then Palestine, showed that he has not lost the sense of humour for which he was known.

"When people say I owe them money, I say, 'I can't hear you,'" said the feisty veteran, who now has a hearing aid but is otherwise in pretty good health.

When asked if he was proud of his family, he replied: "I can tell you that I'm not ashamed of them."

Kernerman still has his own teeth and has never had a filling. He came to the interview room with the aid of a walker and his son David.

"I always did what my father told me: 'Know when to stop.'" Kernerman told The CJN, advising young people who want to reach his age to practise moderation in their life habits.

"He never smoked and never drank except for l'chaim," said granddaughter Edith Kernerman.

Born in Portsmouth, England, one of five brothers and four sisters, at a time of year "when the weather wasn't very receptive," Kernerman came into the world in the 19th century – Jan. 19, 1899, to be exact.

In his late teens, he enlisted in the Royal Engineers, despite being faced with an examiner who said he had varicose veins and flat feet. "I'm as normal as anyone," he protested, threatening to kick the examiner in the shins.

Sent to the Middle East and seconded to the Jewish Legion because they needed someone with his skills as an electrician and general handyman, Kernerman hid a camera in his pants and photographed the exotic spots he saw on his tour of duty.

He sent them home to his family, but became incensed when the censors cut out parts of his letters. "I then wrote my letters so small that even the censors couldn't read them."

He doesn't recall everything about the Jewish Legion and the momentous events of the time, but he does remember meeting leading political figures and the tortuous negotiations between the British government and soldiers like himself about the dismantling of the Legion.

He and his wife later moved to Israel for some years, and five of his six children have lived there for varying periods. Two of them, Lionel, a publisher, and Reesha Zarzer, still do. His other sons, Morry, a violinist with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, David, Barry and Cy, all live in Toronto.

In A Soldier's Voice, a History TV documentary about Canadian World War I veterans, Kernerman recalls the scene when he went off to war. "God knows if I'll ever see you again," his mother said. "Don't worry, mother, I won't do anything that I wouldn't do in front of you," was his reply.

On his 100th birthday last year, he was fêted at a party by his grandchildren and great-grandchildren, who took him to the King Edward hotel, where he had spent his honeymoon in December 1923 with his late wife, Sarah, who predeceased him in 1990.

The hotel manager was so intrigued that he spent hours listening to the veteran's stories, and contributed a bottle of champagne to the festivities.

"We toasted my grandfather and then he toasted us in return, saying he was glad there were no divorces in our family and he was glad that he received no calls at 3 a.m. that one of us was in trouble," recalled Edith Kernerman.

Until his failing health necessitated his move to Sunnybrook, Kernerman lived in an apartment building on Roselawn Avenue, where his fame quickly spread as a man who could bring lamps and toasters back to life, despite the fact that he was in his 90s.

When The CJN interviewer asked if he could come back in 10 years, the man who has lived in three centuries shot back: "Are you asking me or telling me?"

Linda Lundström
Canadian Designer

"Shopping for a swimsuit used to be my worst nightmare.

Before I began designing swimwear, I dreaded shopping for a bathing suit. In fact, I once consumed an entire box of champagne truffles while a sales clerk passed style after style into the changeroom.

Hey, we've all been there!

That's why I created the Sun Goddess Gear collection that allows you to build an entire travel wardrobe around great-fitting swimwear.

It's called Sun Goddess Gear because if you can't feel like a 'Goddess' when you're on vacation, then when can you?

The idea is that you take four or five swimsuits with you on your vacation and the rest of your wardrobe is made up of the coordinating pieces. Because the swimsuits can double as bodysuits, you'll fit everything you will need for a week-long vacation into just one carry-on bag!

Our 'Curvaceous Cut' is an innovation in swimwear that features a y-shaped crotch for a 'creep-free' zone in the derrière and a flattering leg cut that follows your natural curves.

I also make these same swimsuits in styles that can accommodate a prosthesis, since all women deserve to feel sexy in a swimsuit!

Happy travelling!"

CHAT students educate kids about drugs

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Grade 10 student Lisa Feinberg told a junior high school class recently that "the people you hang out with make a difference in what you're going to be like."

Feinberg made that observation, based on her experience at school and summer camps, as part of a five-member team of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) students visiting a Grade 8 class at United Synagogue Day School's (USDS') Bayview Campus.

Similar CHAT teams – 41 students in all – have met or are about to meet with their younger counterparts at Bialik Hebrew Day School, Leo Baeck Day School and three branches of USDS.

The program, called Challenges, Beliefs and Changes, is sponsored by Parents Against Drugs (PAD). CHAT's guidance department has been running it for four years. Older students use role-playing and discussion to help younger ones anticipate challenges they are likely to face in high school.

"A lot of the program [deals] with drug and alcohol choices," said Grade 12 student Jonathan Joffe, who served as facilitator in the USDS classroom. Joining him were fellow students Yiska Danziger, Feinberg, Michal Gordon and Robyn Weintraub.

After screening a video depicting an unsupervised teen party at the first session, the students broke into small discussion groups, each with a CHAT facilitator.

"Which characters do you think made the best decisions and which characters do you think made the worst decisions?" asked Joffe.

One youngster lauded a character who "wasn't afraid to show he didn't want to drink."

"Do you think it would have been OK for [the 17-year-old host] to hold this party if he hadn't let his [14-year-old] sister and her friends attend?" Joffe asked.

"Yes," said one student.

"No," said another. "There was a lot of drinking and drugs."

"It wouldn't have been okay," added a third. "But inviting his sister just made it worse. They're only in Grade 9."

Other issues that typically arise over the three sessions include family rules, boredom, spending money, doing things in a group that one wouldn't do alone, and wanting to be popular, said CHAT guidance counsellor Mirna Alter.

Specially designed games and questions are aimed at providing an opportunity "to look at these issues in a way they might not have had an opportunity to think about yet," she added.

Joffe, a "PAD veteran," loves the program, he said. "It's very satisfying."

Aaron Birenbaum, speaking from a Grade 8 perspective, agreed that the program is beneficial, even though students "kind of know about" the subjects being discussed.

"I think it's necessary to an extent," admitted his classmate Noah Wallach, "but kids know about peer pressure."

The changing face of Jewish education

Even for those who recognize that for Jews the dawning of the year 2000 in the secular calendar had little more significance than the dawning of 1999 did, there has been a palpable feeling of excitement.

It is difficult not to get caught up in the drama of the occasion. Visions of mass computer crashes, transportation deadlocks and accidental missile launches aside, most of us have the sneaking notion that the date signifies endless possibilities and opportunities. So, too, in the field of education.

In many ways, Jewish education is not so very different now than it was in 1000. Emphasis then was placed on Bible study, customs and laws, and prayers. It was a given that Jews should be literate, and although it was sometimes more honoured in the breach than in fact, most were literate, at least in Hebrew.

Even some of the controversies have a familiar ring. How much exposure should children have to secular education? How do we teach them to take what is good from the world around them, while still maintaining Jewish values? What happens to the child who doesn't quite fit in the classroom?

One of the major differences, of course, lies in the education of girls. Except for daughters of certain great scholars such as Rashi, girls were expected to pick up what they needed to know from their mothers. By and large, that is what they did.

And it worked – it is through the efforts and struggles of Jewish women that Jewish practices such as kashrut, Shabbat and festival observance and the primacy of tzedakah have survived over time, through Crusades, Inquisition and persecution, and even through the temptations of golden ages.

Teachers from a thousand years ago would be astonished by the current state of education in Toronto. There are schools serving children of every level of religious observance and children of no religious observance.

Girls are educated equally with boys; in fact, one article in this supplement will show that in many day schools more girls are graduated than boys. We have schools for those with special needs, and those from Sephardi, chassidic and Russian backgrounds.

Education is still seen as one of the most important obligations of the community. In fact, in Toronto, the largest proportion of monies UJA Federation allocates to local causes goes to education.

Still, the need outstrips the funds available, particularly with more families needing tuition subsidies, increasing enrolment, and a greater demand for services. Government cutbacks also impact on the Jewish educational system, notwithstanding the fact that it still refuses funding.

This supplement illustrates how, in spite of these challenges, individuals in the school system are working hard and imaginatively in the interests of our children. We honour them.

We also say a reluctant goodbye to Naomi Emerson, Jacob Korenblum, Ali Bresver and Chaim Greenwald. For eight years, Frances Kraft has followed them as they developed from 12 or 13-year-olds to 20-year-old university students, sure of who they are both as Jews and as young adults.

They had their bar and bat mitzvahs, got their drivers' licences, mourned Yitzhak Rabin and developed philosophies of education, politics and human relationships. The CJN wishes them well, and prays that their dreams come true. Shalom v'hatzlacha.

Education system may not be addressing boys' needs

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

When nursery rhymes taught us that little boys and little girls were made of different stuff, were our educators paying attention?

Recent tests administered by Ontario's Education Quality and Accountability Office indicate that the provincial education system may be working more effectively for girls than boys.

In grades 3 and 6, the grades tested, girls outperformed boys in reading, writing and mathematics.

Some educators feel that the provincial education system may not be dealing with the different needs faced by boys.

And since many of the Hebrew day schools report that they base their general studies curriculum on Ontario Ministry of Education guidelines, they may have similar problems.

With double programs, the day schools have the added challenge of creating a curriculum that can, hopefully, meet the needs of all their students and retain the same number of boys as girls in their schools each year.

Graduating class statistics show that this goal may be currently elusive in some of the Jewish schools.

While Leo Baeck has been able to retain an equal number of boys and girls in their graduating classes, some of the other schools have not been as successful.

This year's Grade 8 class at Bialik contains 17 percent boys, although according to Bialik principal Uri Korin, the graduating class norm is 40 to 45 percent boys.

Dr. William Pollock, professor of psychiatry at Harvard medical school states that the problems that face the boys may stem partly from the schools themselves.

Female students favoured

In the New York Times bestseller, Real Boys, Pollock writes that "the very structure of most co-educational schools tends, unwittingly, to favour female students…teachers have become well sensitized to girls' voices – sometimes at the expense of their ability to recognize boys' voices – and many educators do not understand boys' characteristic learning styles."

Furthermore, Pollock writes "boys are now twice as likely as girls to be labeled as 'learning disabled,'…and in some school systems, are up to ten times more likely to be diagnosed with…attention deficit disorder (for which many boys receive potent medications with potentially serious side effects)."

Some educators have said boys work these issues out by the time they get to high school and university.

However, according to Pollock "fewer boys than girls now attend and graduate from college. Fifty-nine percent of all master's degree candidates are now women, and the percentage of men in graduate-level professional education is shrinking each year."

Otto Weininger, a professor of child psychology and educational theory at OISE at the University of Toronto, said that at some point in the learning process, we may be alienating the boys.

"Our schools expect that boys will have an inner radar system and that they'll know what is expected from them the minute they enter the classroom," Weininger said.

"However, our curriculum doesn't deal with the different maturation rates or [different] rates of social development between boys and girls."

Some of the boys, who are not yet able to cope with the demands placed on them, begin to fidget, lose focus or misbehave. They are then punished for this seeming inability to stay focused, Weininger said.

And punishments, such as being sent out of the classroom, or reduced recess time, can limit cognitive abilities and emotional skills, he said.

Child-centred approach urged to teach boys

A more effective way to deal with these issues would be to utilize child-centred strategies, rather than the didactic approach used in schools today.

For example, Weininger said, teachers often find themselves punishing boys who can't contain their excitement when they know the answers to questions. The boys talk out of turn in a classroom where teachers must give equal time to all the children. The problem is resolved by sending the boy to the principal's office.

A more child-centred approach would be to organize spontaneous debates, or to allow the boys to write down their answers and present them at prearranged times, Weininger said.

While some believe in child-centred solutions, other educators believe that it is important to begin with separating the boys and girls into different classes, as many of the Orthodox Hebrew day schools already do.

Girls fit more easily into mould for learning

Rabbi Sholom Rephun, principal of the Manhattan Day School, wrote in a 1960s report that "the recognition that boys and girls learn differently and that our schools are perhaps creating a mould for learning into which our girls fit more easily than boys, has given rise to many studies and much speculation as to the desirability of co-education."

Pollack writes that today "many [schools] fail to recognize that many boys may actually learn differently than girls do and thus need to be taught differently too.

"Too many schools are failing to address boys' unique social and emotional needs and are not providing the kinds of classroom activities and approaches that will help most boys to thrive," Pollack notes.

"Some research suggests that, whereas many girls may prefer to learn by watching or listening," Pollock states, "boys generally prefer to learn by doing, by engaging in some action-oriented task.

"Fortunately, some educators 'get it'" writes Pollock. "Some educators understand that boys may learn differently than girls and that if boys' unique needs are properly addressed, boys will be able to catch up."

Zita Gardner, principal of Leo Baeck, says that she believes that one of the reasons Leo Baeck has been successful at retaining an equal number of boys and girls is due to the philosophy of the school.

"We have an egalitarian outlook," she said. "However, we recognize that there are gender differences."

The staff uses different learning styles as well as creativity to reach the children.

"For example," she said, "we provide carpets and tables in every classroom. Sometimes learning takes place somewhere between the table and the carpet.

"We try to recognize the fact that boys need more active learning through to Grade 8."

Rachael Turkienicz, Judaic studies director, Toronto Heschel School said the integration of the general and Jewish studies with the arts program at Heschel allows the children to combine learning with hands-on applications.

Boys learn about Jewish models that reflect their own realities – Isaac as contemplative and Jacob as active – and both are valued. They then reinforce these concepts in their arts projects, Turkienicz said.

At USDS, Laura Wiseman, director of Judaic Studies, said that "we very much need to vary methodologies to reach students with a variety of learning styles."

Wiseman said that currently, the professional development route at USDS is to focus on an understanding of multiple intelligences.

"We want to start with the child, his/her proclivities and interests, and then move outwards to curriculum. Not the other way around."

As to the desirability of co-education, Wiseman said that "it is important for a classroom to be a microcosm of real life and the world.

"To function in the world you need to have learned to collaborate with all different kinds of people."

While some educators do "get it," evidence indicates that there are still obstacles to overcome.

"Many teachers and administrators care greatly about boys," Pollock writes. "But often, because of a lack of resources or of... training and understanding, a lot of our schools simply don't know how to handle the specific challenges of teaching and supervising boys."

Toronto parents set to open Jewish Montessori day school

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The first Canadian Montessori Jewish Day School will open in Toronto in September 2000.

A grassroots organizing committee of concerned parents, educators, and teachers-in-training with backgrounds in Montessori educational methods and strong Judaic backgrounds, have been actively building the structure for the new school.

Max Dublin, who is spearheading the development of the school, told The CJN that the project began when he recognized that his son, Ephraim, was having trouble in his regular Jewish preschool class.

Ephraim, who was verbally precocious and spoke full sentences at the age of two, had developed skills at a higher level than the other students. Dublin, who also wanted Ephraim to receive a Hebrew education, began searching for an educational system that would provide him with a more challenging environment as well as the Judaic subjects.

Dublin, who has a doctorate in education and has taught preschool and university levels of education, searched the Internet and discovered that there were three Jewish Montessori schools in the United States, one in Israel and one in Mexico City.

He enrolled Ephraim at Taddle Creek Montessori School in the Spadina-Bloor area and he threw himself into creating a Jewish-focused Montessori school.

"We felt that Ephraim, who is now four years old, needed the Montessori environment, which allows him and the students to learn at their own pace."

The Montessori method of teaching was established in Italy almost a century ago by Maria Montessori.

Dublin explains that the structure of the Montessori class allows teachers to spend as much time with a student as that student requires.

"Montessori education begins at the age of three or when a child is potty trained," Dublin says.

He explains that the Montessori approach acknowledges that "children are ready to learn all sorts of things at an early age if they are presented in the right way. They learn through immersion using special materials: At Montessori, children learn to write before they learn to print."

The classes are of mixed ages – 3 to 6, 6 to 9, and 9 to 12 year olds – and students have the same teacher for three years.

"The children develop strong bonds with their teachers and the older children help the younger students and the younger students model themselves after the older ones."

This system, he adds, helps students become self-motivated. "They learn at their own speed and they learn how to work independently."

The Judaic curriculum, he says, is non-denominational. "The school will focus on the laws, history and Jewish culture. The students will study the differences in our religious and cultural practices while emphasizing the unity of Judaism. They will learn to respect the differences and will be able to make choices."

He adds that the school will also have a strong program in the arts, music and gymnastics. "Often, the theory of education and practice are miles apart. At Montessori, these are brought together."

'CJN students' - from teen years to young adults

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — They're all grown up now. Ali Bresver, Naomi Emerson, Chaim Greenwald and Jacob Korenblum have appeared in the CJN education supplement annually since January 1992. At the time all four youngsters – each representing a different Jewish school – were within a year of their bar and bat mitzvahs. We have revisited them each year to look at their views on Judaism, Israel and life.

For our final interview of the series, Ali, Naomi and Jacob met at The CJN*'s Toronto office. Chaim was interviewed separately by phone from Forest Hills, N.Y., where he is studying at the Chafetz Chaim Yeshiva.*

It's really weird, said Ali, a 20-year-old journalism and international development studies major at King's College in Halifax. "We don't know each other, but we do. We share these things in this room..."

"...in a special way," added Jacob. The three students – one Reform, one Conservative and one Orthodox – laughed in agreement.

Naomi, 20, an alumna of Associated Hebrew Schools and Ulpanat Orot, has remained true to her Orthodox upbringing. At York University, where she is studying kinesiology, she is friendly with Jewish and non-Jewish students but her social milieu outside school is Jewish. She prefers it that way.

"I do have to be strong about who I am," she said. "It really is the first time I'm confronted so much with meeting all different types of people – and I find that fascinating."

A Chinese classmate – a religious Christian – has become a friend, and they talk about different aspects of their religions.

Jacob, 20, is a graduate of Bialik Hebrew Day School and Northern Secondary School. He has moved from residence to an apartment near the University of Toronto's downtown campus, where he is studying international relations, and still spends Jewish holidays and Friday nights with his family, who practise Conservative Judaism.

For Jacob, attending a Zionist elementary school piqued his curiosity about other perspectives. When he visited Israel in 1998, he made a point of talking to Arabs to get their side of the story.

In retrospect, it seems strange to him that, at Bialik, non-Jewish perspectives were "very absent.

"But who are we kidding? I'm Jewish. I needed that firm foundation in Judaism, and for sure Bialik gave it to me."

Jacob's Jewish identity has been further strengthened, he feels, by working at a "very multi-cultural" Scarborough public school this year.

"Every time you have to explain yourself to someone else, I think you start to think about it more yourself...It's very difficult to explain to [students who have just immigrated] that I'm from Canada and so are my parents and even my grandparents, however, I have this very unique identity in my own tradition."

Ali, a graduate of Lawrence Park Collegiate and Temple Emanu-El's supplementary school, made waves early in the series when she indicated it wouldn't matter to her if she married someone non-Jewish.

"Since then it's completely changed," she said. Today, finding someone Jewish is "really important to me. I want to raise my kids Jewish and give them what my parents gave me – a strong Jewish home."

Being in a school with a relatively small Jewish population and living with non-Jewish housemates, Ali is proud of being Jewish and has a "strong set" of Jewish friends.

"I say that I'm Jewish, and I'm out there. I don't walk around wearing a big sign on my head, but it definitely is a strong part of me."

Looking back on the past eight years, one of the most amazing experiences has been coming to her own realizations, not just going along with her parents' point of view, said Ali.

Turning 20 was a little scary

Leaving their teen years behind elicited a variety of reactions for the students. Turning 20 was a little scary, admitted Jacob.

"[But] it's nice in a sense. You start to become more accountable as a person. You stop being called a kid...It's a new stage of your life. I definitely feel more commonalities now with people who are in the age bracket of 20 to even 30. Once you've moved out of those high school years, you've really moved into a whole new realm."

Chaim, 21, always wished to be older when he was a teenager, but now, he said, "I'm starting to get scared that life's going by really quickly."

Ali wasn't happy about turning 20, but an elaborate scheme turned her mood around. Her roommate had invited her to dinner with visiting relatives – a ruse, as it turned out.

The icing on the birthday cake, so to speak, was having her mother, who she thought was at home in Toronto, greet her at her surprise party.

Ali realized there was a new dimension to her life when her mother accompanied her to a few classes.

"When I was 16 or 17, if my mom had come to my high school and shown her face, it was like..." Ali paused and shielded her eyes with her hand. The gesture clearly indicated what had once been too embarrassing for words.

All four students would like to marry and have children of their own, but not imminently. Projecting five years down the road, Ali hopes to have a good job at a sports network.

Naomi is seriously considering a career in speech therapy. "I don't know where life's going to take me," she said. Talking about marriage, at this point, "sounds so weird," she added.

Likewise for Ali – that's why she said she sees herself getting married in about 10 years, not five.

Jacob expects he'll still be a student in 2005. He doesn't know what he'll end up doing. "I don't know. It doesn't bother me, though."

They worry about the future of the world, particularly economic gaps and lack of human rights, said Jacob.

"It's a very small world now," said Naomi.

All four students have spent time in Israel and keep an eye on developments in the Middle East.

"There's no easy solution," said Ali, referring to current negotiations with Syria.

"I think it's great that they're

University of Toronto ~ Faculty of Arts and Science ~ Jewish Studies Program

A Quarter Century of Excellence in Jewish Studies

For over 25 years, the Jewish studies program at the University of Toronto has been engaged in teaching, research and scholarship. This multidisciplinary program, which encompasses the Arts and Science departments of English, German, History, Near and Middle Eastern Civilizations, Philosophy, Sociology and the Study of Religion, is unique in Canada for the breadth and depth of its curriculum.

Over 60 courses are offered in language (Hebrew, Yiddish, Aramaic, Syriac and Greek); in literature (rabbinic, medieval, modern and contemporary) in both original texts and translation; in history, from the biblical period to the present; and in religion, archeology, philosophy and sociology with particular emphasis on the study of Judaism in modernity.

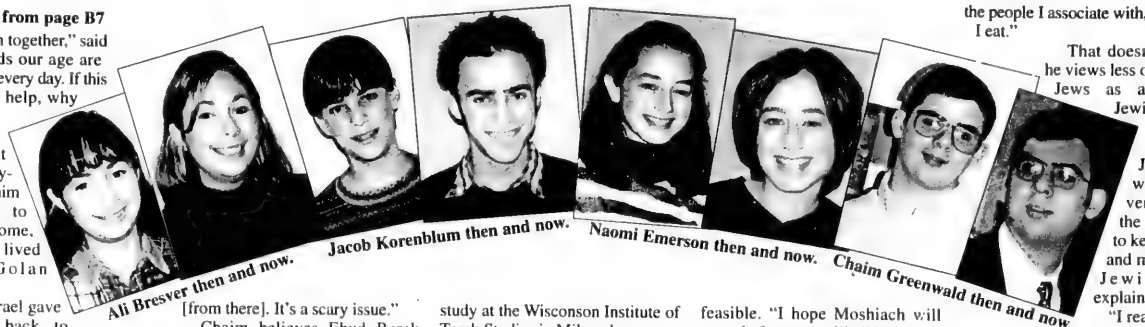
sitting down together," said Jacob. "Kids our age are dying there every day. If this is going to help, why not?"

And yet, he can't imagine anyone telling him he'd have to leave his home, if he lived on the Golan Heights.

When Israel gave the Sinai back to Egypt, he noted, it was an "agonizing process." But the border area is now safe, he added, and he has personally reaped the benefits, having visited Egypt with minimal difficulty in 1998.

The other students are not as optimistic. "You don't know what's going to be," said Naomi. "I'm not a military expert, but I just can't fathom it...I went hiking in the Golan. Anyone can shoot right down [from there]. It's a scary issue."



Ali Bresver then and now. Jacob Korenblum then and now. Naomi Emerson then and now. Chaim Greenwald then and now.

Chaim believes Ehud Barak "knows the security needs of the country," but worries that the Israeli prime minister may be acting as a result of pressure from the United States.

Chaim has just begun a 10-year rabbinical program at New York's Chafetz Chaim Yeshiva, following two years of study at a yeshiva in Israel.

An alumnus of Eitz Chaim Day School, he left Toronto at age 14 to study at the Wisconson Institute of Torah Studies in Milwaukee.

Seven years later, he sees himself less as a Canadian and more as "a Jew in exile."

Chaim's days are filled with study and prayer. His program, which includes intensive study of Torah and ethics, will prepare him for a career in Jewish education and outreach.

He would love to be living in Israel 10 years down the road, he said, but he's not sure it will be feasible. "I hope Moshiach will come before, so we'll all be there."

This year, he's been teaching a small group of Jewish public school students once a week. "I never realized how different my upbringing was from a public school kid," he said. "I was shocked to see the way they behave. It's just incredible – the fighting, the foul language."

Still, he finds it satisfying working with them and seeing that they have an interest in Judaism.

Chaim's own Jewish identity has deepened over the past eight years.

"Maybe I used to feel that I'm a person like any other, but I'm different because I'm a Jew. Now it's not just different. I'm a Jew, which is a totally different person. Everything I do is governed by the fact that I'm a Jew – the clothes I wear, the people I associate with, the food I eat."

That doesn't mean he views less observant Jews as any less Jewish. Anyone born Jewish or who converts with the intention to keep Torah and mitzvot is Jewish, he explains.

"I realize [the less observant] are not yet on that level. I hope they will be," he said.

A few times a week, when he has a break, Chaim tries to make time for exercise like roller blading or fast walking. He tries to read the New York Times once in a while as well, he said.

Of the other three students, only Naomi is pursuing her Jewish education on a regular basis, by studying with a friend once a week. "I'm so busy," she said. "I don't do enough."

"It's almost a luxury to participate in some form of spiritual education," said Jacob. "It doesn't mean it doesn't play a huge part in your life."

"Or," said Ali, "that you can't get back to it at any point."

Saying goodbye to my 'other' kids

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Comment

TORONTO — I have a confession. Over the past eight years, I've come to think of Ali, Chaim, Jacob and Naomi as my "other" kids.

As a mother of two children now in their teens, I looked at the foursome as a sort of bellwether, offering hope that the teen years wouldn't be as bad as they're sometimes said to be.

Of course, this group was hand-picked. And they've been excellent representatives of their respective Jewish backgrounds, always forthcoming with substantive comments on their values, their hopes for the future, Judaism, Israel and life in general.

Our only regret — speaking on behalf of The CJN — was that of the four, none opted to study at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), the city's Jewish community high school. In an attempt to fill that gap, we introduced a CHAT student in 1996, but he chose not to continue in the series.

For me, a high point was the first joint interview, held during Sukkot 1995. Although Jacob was not able to attend, Ali, Naomi and Chaim had a spirited dialogue on Jewish identity, dating and belief in God.

"That was the [interview] I've learned the most from," said Ali this year. "I've become more open to what everyone else has to say, and I think that it helped us grow in our own ways."

I found it heartening to see youngsters from such divergent Jewish backgrounds talking and listening to each other about what it means to be Jewish.

And at the risk of sounding – to borrow a teenage expression – "cheesy," Ali, Chaim, Jacob and Naomi leave me feeling optimistic about the future. It was a very satisfying way to count down to the new millennium.

Reena expanding evening programs to meet demand

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

Noah Wolanski and volunteer Jacob Scotaro during a session of Kids club, a social program for children.

TORONTO — Reena, an organization for people with developmental disabilities, has a list of about 200 people waiting to be accepted into its residential and day programs.

Those who cannot gain entrance often turn to Reena's evening sessions. So, to accommodate this need, the organization has added six new evening programs, including a social and recreational club for children ages three to 12, a job-readiness group, an art therapy series, folk-dance sessions and a new group for teens, called Reena Teen Scene.

But evening sessions, which are normally no longer than two hours, are not an adequate replacement for Reena's day program which is akin to a community college program, said Sandy Keshen, Reena's executive director.

"It's a stopgap, just a halfway measure. We can't leave them [people with developmental disabilities] with nothing," she said.

In the last seven years, Reena has experienced a 13 percent cutback in government funding, Keshen said.

Few after-school programs are available for children with developmental delays and the programs that are offered often do not have a Jewish cultural perspective, she added.

"Families have been left with no activity for their children to go to after school and in the evenings. For some people, evening and after-school programs are the only chance they have to socialize," she said.

Reena wants to introduce more after-school programs, more employment preparation sessions and more social development programs for children with specialized needs, such as autistic children. People have expressed a need for these programs in past Reena questionnaires.

While Reena traditionally caters to adults, the organization has realized the existence of a shortage of children's programs for the developmentally disabled, especially programs after school hours.

According to Keshen, Reena has been seeing more and more children with very complex needs – young people who traditionally have been in institutions.

At the same time, the executive director has noticed families are more decisive about the kind of programming they would like for their children.

"Families are very clear. They want their children to have the same opportunity as other kids have – to play, to belong, to be included."

USDS teacher helping with new school Bible curriculum

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A teacher at United Synagogue Day School is the only Canadian on a team of educators writing a new Bible curriculum for the Solomon Schechter Day Schools.

Ami Sabari, a middle school teacher at the Bathurst campus was one of the writers chosen from among teachers throughout United States and Canada.

The new curriculum, called by the Hebrew acronym MaToK, is co-sponsored by the department of education of the United Synagogue for Conservative Judaism, the Melton Research Centre and the Solomon Schechter Day School Principal's Council.

Sabari, who spent last July in New York working on the project aimed at students from grades 3 to 8, says that the team's goals include infusing Torah study with the philosophy of the Conservative movement, addressing the multiple ways in which children can learn, providing for serious discussions about God, and producing user-friendly materials.

The new curriculum, which will be piloted in several Solomon Schechter schools, is geared to students at all levels and age groups, and teachers will be able to use appropriate materials for each group, says Sabari.

Laura Wiseman, director of Judaic studies at USDS, says the curriculum is exciting because it encourages students to make real meaning out of what they learn in Torah.

"In Conservative Judaism, there is no imperative to understand Torah as a historic or scientific document. We treat Torah as a meeting place of God and Jews.

"The formulation of questions is strongly encouraged, and we urge students to develop a variety of plausible solutions to each other's questions, even before turning to the classical commentaries," she says.

The new program stresses the building of biblical scholarship in multi-level ways, says Wiseman. "As well, students and teachers will be learning the curriculum together, so they will develop a strong bond."

Lucy Cohen, director of education at USDS, says she looks forward to introducing the new curriculum to the school.

"Students will learn how to analyse, as well as how to read the text interpretively, and will keep a log of what they have learned," Cohen says. "It makes students active in the entire learning process, and it gives them a sense of involvement."

Zareinu enrolment continues to grow

'Constantly evolving waiting list'

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

At Zareinu Educational Centre's former site, the developmentally disabled children often had therapy in hallways and stairwells.

"Every nook and cranny was used for therapy," says Carol Goldman, principal of the centre.

Equipment was crowded into hallways and there was no outdoor playground for the children at the Bathurst Street location.

So in September 1998, Zareinu moved its elementary school children to the Sephardic Kehila Centre and a year later, as a result of rapidly increasing numbers, children in the infant, preschool and kindergarten programs were also moved there.

But while this location has more space and better facilities, Zareinu still does not have the room to accommodate the steadily increasing demand for its services, Goldman says.

Enrolment at Zareinu has almost doubled in four years, from 35 children in September 1996, to 60 this year.

"The increasing demand for MEDEK [a physiotherapy technique for children with neuro-muscular diseases] and the success we have had in our infant intervention program have made us a very sought after day treatment and special education centre," Goldman says.

Along with government cutbacks to services, this demand has led to a "constantly evolving waiting list" and a flow of children who are trying to find services, she says.

Also, Goldman adds, children's disabilities are being identified at an earlier stage.

"As early intervention now is so much in the forefront, there are more and more children with complex needs needing our services at an earlier stage."

If the school cannot accept a child because of lack of space or because he or she is not suitable for Zareinu, the child is not just abandoned, says Gloria Silver, co-ordinator of Zareinu Doliars the school's fund-raising program.

Zareinu can present a child's needs to a group of agencies called The North York Intake Co-ordination Team, of which Zareinu is a member, and this group will help families find appropriate services for their child.

Zareinu's Project Outlook provides day-to-day support

But often, when families are put in touch with these services, they face long waiting lists or are forced to go to one agency for help with behaviour management, another agency for speech therapy, another agency for academic training, and so on, Silver says.

"Every lost therapy hour, every lost intervention hour is something you can't get back," she says.

Gail Cadsby, whose grandson, Jesse, suffered devastating seizures two weeks before his first birthday, knows the frustration of going from facility to facility for help.

In December 1994, Jesse went into a coma at The Hospital for Sick Children. He suffered brain damage, could no longer speak and was prone to fever-induced seizures.

A neurologist told Cadsby: "You really should pray that he'll die," and said that Jesse would be a vegetable.

Staff at The Hospital for Sick Children suggested his family consider The Bloorview MacMillan Centre (formerly Bloorview Hospital) because the centre has a residence. But Cadsby says she did not think Bloorview was suitable, because while Jesse has multiple disabilities, Bloorview deals primarily with children who have a single disability.

She went to about six of each type of therapist – physiotherapists, occupational therapists and speech therapists, she says.

"I took him for vision tests, hearing tests, and everyone said, 'He is not going to develop. He's got brain damage. Don't put too much hope in his future. There is not going to be much development.'"

Cadsby did not want to believe it. "It was frustrating. It made me very angry. I could see this little boy had a lot more going on than anyone was able to admit," she says.

Cadsby spoke to Rabbi Joseph Kelman at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue who suggested Zareinu. Jesse began attending the school in September 1996, when he was almost three years old.

Since then, Cadsby has seen a huge change in his development. "He can run, he can jump…he's learning a form of sign language."

New location

On Tuesday, Jan. 4, he celebrated his sixth birthday at school and blew out his birthday candles for the first time.

Cadsby believes that had Jesse not been admitted to Zareinu, he "would have been a child who slips between the cracks."

Recognizing the stress many parents face when caring for a developmentally disabled child, Zareinu runs a UJA Federation-funded initiative, Project Outreach, which provides support for a child's day-to-day activities.

As part of the project, Goldman says, Zareinu often sends a social worker or occupational therapist to a home to assess needs. The worker may recommend devices such as special switches for lights and adapted utensils for eating, to improve the child's independence.

In its new location, Zareinu has four therapy rooms, but Goldman estimates the school needs at least double that number to accommodate its 60 children.

Therapy sessions have already begun to overflow into the lunchroom and the social worker's office, and while staff at the Kehila Centre have been very accommodating, the centre was not designed for children with special needs, Goldman says.

For the last two years, Zareinu has been seeking a site upon which the school can build its own home.

Last year, when the school bid for a plot of land in Vaughan, the surrounding community fought to prevent the purchase.

"The community put a lot of pressure on the politicians not to allow us to build," says Danny Gordon, chairman of Zareinu's board of directors.

"The neighbours didn't want us. They didn't want a handicapped school," he says.

Zareinu consulted its lawyers who said it would be a long fight and there would be only a 50-50 chance the school would win, Gordon says.

"We don't really have the time for this. We need time to fundraise…we don't have the time or the money to fight the community," he says.

Even if Zareinu had won, the school would have "ended up in a place where the entire community didn't want us."

So, Zareinu continues its quest. According to Gordon, the school is looking at three different sites.

"I think we'll be able to finalize a deal between six and 12 months [from now]," he says.

But even when Zareinu secures land, its battle for a home will not be over yet. It will still have to raise the approximately $5 million needed for a new building.

Weizmann Summer Science Program

TORONTO — Selected high school students will represent Canada at an international summer science program on the campus of the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel.

The Dr. Bessie F. Lawrence 32nd International Summer Science Institute is an integrated program geared toward highly motivated science students. The program lasts from July 3 to 28.

Applicants must have excelled in their school science studies and have demonstrated their motivation to gain deeper scientific knowledge, above and beyond what is taught in high school, by completing extra research projects or participating science competitions or summer programs.

Students should be interested in pursuing a career in research science, must be in their last year of secondary school, approximately 18 years of age and proficient in English.

The main focus of the program is student participation in the ongoing laboratory work of the Weizmann Institute, where there are people of all cultures and denominations and the program is very structured and intensive.

Students will be working under laboratory conditions and must have a sense of teamwork and be able to interact in a group with 70 other participants.

The first three weeks are spent working in the campus laboratories. On completing the program, participants give an oral presentation and submit a report. The final week of the program is spent at a field school in the Judean Desert.

The application deadline is March 1. For more information, call Sheri Federman at 416-733-9220.

Educational programs thriving downtown

Community returns to its roots

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

In the early decades of the 20th century the hub of Jewish communal life in Toronto was in the downtown core of the city.

The downtown community atrophied as Jews began moving north along the Bathurst corridor in the 1950s. Synagogues, Hebrew schools and other communal institutions relocated.

But the last decade has seen a renewal of Jewish communal life in the inner city that has been characterized by the growth of older downtown synagogues like the First Narayever Congregation and the Minsker Shul and by the establishment of grass roots congregations like the Danforth Jewish Circle in Riverdale and the West End Jewish Association, in Bloor West Village.

Jewish educational programs for children have developed in conjunction with the expansion of Jewish communities in the inner city.

The academic year 1998-1999 saw the opening of a new Jewish day school – the Downtown Jewish Day School. Located at the Bloor JCC, the DJDS is the only day school to be operating in the downtown core.

Director Joan Schoenfeld, spoke about the school, which now has 32 students ranging from senior kindergarten to Grade 3. The school will increase by one grade a year and will eventually go to Grade 8.

Schoenfeld said the school, which she called an independent community-based egalitarian school, "supports academic excellence within a nurturing and enriched environment."

The school has an association with the Abraham Joshua Heschel School in New York City: Peter Geffen, the founder of that school, serves as the project consultant to the DJDS board of directors.

Schoenfeld said the DJDS started with a group of parents who used the nursery program at the JCC. She said they wanted their children to continue to be educated "in this wonderful nurturing environment... They wanted a Jewish day school."

Schoenfeld joined the group a year later, in 1998, and the school opened the following year after receiving a substantial grant from the Partnership in Excellence for Jewish Education (PEJE), an American-based group of 12 philanthropists.

Schoenfeld wears two educational hats. She is also the founder and principal of the Downtown Jewish Community School, now in operation for 20 years.

The supplementary school, which is also based at the Bloor JCC, started with 45 students in 1979. Today there are 350 students on its roster and a large waiting list for almost every grade.

The school offers programs from junior kindergarten through to high school. The classes – they include prayer, Jewish studies and Hebrew – meet Sundays until Grade 7 and starting in Grade 2 include Hebrew classes on Wednesday afternoons.

Schoenfeld said the high school program for students in grades 8 to 12 has been expanded to include a Judaica arts program.

Another Sunday school program in the same vicinity is the Hillel Children's Workshop, a co-operative school which holds classes at New College at the University of Toronto.

Some 50 children attend the program which Stephen Zener, treasurer of the program, described as "totally volunteer run." While the children study, parents attend lectures and discussion groups.

The program offers a secular Judaic studies program and holiday celebrations for students in JK to Grade 7, along with optional Hebrew classes; the traditional holiday and Shabbat prayers are also taught, Zener said.

He called the program "liberal" and said it appeals to parents who want more secular education for their children and attracts many interfaith couples.

Across town, in the east end of the inner city, the Jewish Studies Program of the burgeoning Danforth Jewish Circle – there are some 150 member families – is now in its second year.

The program which runs from grades 1 to 7 has 54 students. Marcia Gilbert is educational co-ordinator of the program which has four teachers and four assistants for four classes.

"The school is a parent-run volunteer school which we established in 1998," said Debbie Plested, who co-chairs the school program with Eve-Lynn Stein.

"Our children's Jewish studies program is designed and dedicated to providing our children with a positive Jewish experience, an understanding of their heritage and history, and a sense of belonging to a diverse community with a unique culture."

The school started with 27 students last year and doubled in size, she said. "We're very excited by the response from our community and by how the school has grown.

"The kids are learning Hebrew, history, Jewish values and holiday and Shabbat celebrations."

The school program evolved from a heritage language program, which continues to run out of a local school for kindergarten students.

The heritage language program did not provide enough continuity for the older children and so the new school program was developed to accommodate students in the older grades, Plested explained.

Much of the funding for the school comes from the Bloor JCC, UJA Federation and the Jewish Outreach Institute, an organization based in New York which is dedicated to providing outreach to unaffiliated and interfaith communities across North America.

Farther east, the Sunday school at the Beaches shul has been running for almost two decades and has 15 students enrolled this year.

Across town in the Bloor West Village, for approximately 10 years, there has been an association of Jewish people -- the West End Jewish Association.

The association, which has about 100 names on its newsletter mailing list, has for the last few years focused on education, Dr. Sherri Taub told The CJN.

The organization used to hold large events for the entire community, but they became too expensive to run, she said. "Now we're going to the JCC for those programs."

Her husband, Tzvi Taub, a part-time cantor devised the education program which includes history, Hebrew and holiday celebrations. The program is attended by 16 children in the area.

A core group of about a dozen families send their children to the Sunday school and participate in monthly Shabbat programs, which take place at people's homes.

Most of the families are associate members of the Knesseth Israel, Tzvi Taub said.

The Sunday school classes are held at the Knesseth Israel or the Junction Shul, as it is known, which is located in the city's west end. Classes also take place on Wednesday afternoon at the homes of participating families.

"We're trying to give them the essentials," he said.

Toronto educational scene 'a model,' says Epi

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

In all areas of Jewish education, the Toronto Jewish community is a flagship for the rest of the Diaspora, says Seymour Epstein.

Epstein, or Epi as he is known to many, is the recently appointed director of the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and vice-president for Jewish education at United Jewish Appeal – Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

He received a doctorate in education in 1976 at the University of Toronto.

Toronto leaders recognized Jewish education as such a vital part of Jewish communal life "that they were one of the first in North America to fund day schools from federation budgets," Epstein says.

"I believe that Jewish education is pervasive, strategic, and essential in the life of a Jewish community."

Epstein describes the Toronto Jewish educational scene as "a model."

Toronto has a great variety of day and supplementary schools representing all flavours of Judaism, all ideologies, cultures and interests, he says. From early childhood to the senior years, there is a place for every individual who wants to learn.

The phenomenal growth of the day school movement continues to bring more and more students into the numerous campus locations, Epstein says.

Seymour Epstein

According to recent BJE statistics, the 30 Jewish day schools have a population of more than 11,000 students. There are 1,400 attending preschool classes, a figure which does not include community centre schools.

BJE reports that there are more than 40 supplementary Hebrew schools with an enrolment of 6,000 students.

The largest day school system is the Associated Hebrew Schools, followed by United Synagogue Day School, Eitz Chaim Day Schools, Bialik Hebrew Day School and Leo Baeck Day School. Some schools have several campuses.

Students from elementary day schools as well as those who have not had the benefit of an elementary Jewish day school education come together at the high school, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

CHAT is growing and recently expanded the Wilmington campus which houses more than 1,100 high school students.

"The community character at CHAT, which is open to all streams of Jewish life, is a rare combination – it is a training ground for Jewish leadership and it will help meet the needs of the future community here in Toronto and in Israel," says Epstein.

He notes that across Canada, among Jews and non-Jews, there is a return to spiritual values, ethnic identification and a desire for cultural diversity.

"At the end of the last century, Jews were given the opportunity to be free Canadians. At the end of this century, Jews are realizing the option of becoming free Jews."

Epstein, 54, who has been active in every aspect of Jewish education, worked as an educational consultant in Morocco. He was involved in education in western Europe and the former Soviet Union.

Epstein believes that "the community has to find a way [so] that every child born in the Jewish community has the right to a Jewish education of his or her choice."

He explains that a priority of the BJE is to continue to enhance the quality of teaching in all settings, from nursery school to adult education.

"Our role at the BJE is to support and enhance all efforts at Jewish education, formal and informal. Curriculum development is high on our priority list at the board.

"The Toronto community has a great tradition of commitment and devotion to education," he emphasizes, "and that has to continue."

Associated scholarships available for Israel study

TORONTO — Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto has announced it is accepting applications for scholarships for post-secondary Jewish studies programs in Israel.

Funding for the scholarships, which are awarded annually to qualifying candidates, are made available by Associated's scholarship and endowment committee.

The awards are designed to assist graduates of Associated who propose to pursue post-secondary Judaic studies in a recognized institution in Israel. Priority is given to applicants seeking to prepare themselves for a career in Jewish education.

Candidates must have completed Grade 8 at Associated and be graduates of a recognized Jewish high school or yeshiva.

In June 1999, six awards totalling $9,000 were made. Award winners were: Yael Ben-Dat, Hebrew University; Itamar Danziger, Yeshivat Hamivtar; Karen Held, Hebrew University; Anna-Rachel Krakowsky, Midreshet Moriah; Talia Rosenfield, Michelet Orot; Jory Scherer, Hebrew University.

All awards are for a single year, but the school will consider applications to renew awards. Payment is conditional on receipt of satisfactory evidence that the candidate has successfully completed the program for which the award was made.

Deadline for receipt of applications for the 2000-2001 academic year is March 31. Awards cannot be retroactive.

Application forms are available by writing to Associated Hebrew Schools Scholarship Committee, 6100 Leslie St., Willowdale, Ont., M2H 3J1, or by phoning 416-494-7666, ext. 334.

Russian day school evolves into community academy

Based on European philosophy

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Ohr Menachem Academy of Toronto has, in a short period of time, evolved into a community school.

The school's opening in September 1997 was spearheaded by Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, director of the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC), when he realized that Russian students often did not stay in the day school system.

Henya Schechter, principal of Ohr Menachem says, however, "We soon realized that to succeed, we needed a mixture of students from all segments of the community, and it is happening.

"Ohr Menachem is by no means solely for Russian children. We accept any Jewish child willing and able to meet our high academic and behavioural standards."

These standards, she says, are based on the philosophy of European schools.

Ohr Menachem also offers enriched curriculums with an emphasis on respect for all shades of Judaism, she adds.

"Most of our students come from secular homes. The parents want their children to know they are Jews and to become proud Jews."

The school has developed to Grade 3, and "we hope to add a grade each year to Grade 12, Schechter says."

Schechter says that the goal of the school, which is located on Edinburgh Drive, is to maximize the potential of every student.

"Our theme is education for life," says Schechter. "Our goal is not only to get students through math or Chumash, but to prepare them to make decisions and to succeed on all levels – professionally, morally and ethically."

Sarah Dyman measures Daniel Kur at the Ohr Menachem campus.

'Love of learning'

In Judaic studies, the chassidic approach is used, based on the teachings of Lubavitch, "love for every Jewish soul wherever he or she may be. To attain this, we look for teachers who are warm and caring and go beyond the call of duty."

Following the European tradition, she says, the day begins with a spiritual message. "Respect for authority and elders is emphasized. As an example, students rise when a person of authority enters the room."

'We push students to achieve through love of learning'

At Ohr Menachem, they believe that actions become part of your way of life and help build character, Schechter says. "We emphasize positive behaviour and reward honesty."

She adds that "we push students to achieve through love of learning because we have faith in their capabilities."

The school teaches Hebrew language, and in the Judaic studies department, students study the Hebrew texts. But the classroom discussions are in English. "We believe that this helps students absorb the material," Schechter says.

Heavy stress is placed on math and sciences. "Our aim is to give our students the ability to internalize the material, to analyse, think and express themselves," she says.

To allow the students to enjoy their evenings with their family, Ohr Menachem has a homework and extracurricular program between 4 and 6 p.m.

"We believe that this takes the pressure off parents, particularly those who are working. And we are able to work with students who require additional help."

Schechter notes that next fall, Ohr Menachem will move to larger and brighter facilities at 8808 Bathurst St. in Thornhill. The name of the school has recently been changed to The Toronto Jewish Academy Ohr Menachem (TJA).

Demand for remedial services is on the rise, JVS finds

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Recent studies have shown a dramatic increase in the number of children who have difficulties in reading and writing, says Ruth Borchiver, chief psychologist at Jewish Vocational Service.

This finding has been proven valid in public schools and Jewish day schools around the world, she said. "Children are simply not learning as expected."

Among her other duties, Borchiver is director of a program that provides vocational and psychological assessments and remediation to day schools in the Greater Toronto Area. She is convinced that the difficulty lies not only in reading and writing, but also in listening and ability to pay attention.

The increased demand for remediation, she said, has led to "a two-tiered system of education – regular classes, and a growing number of children who need smaller classes and expert remedial teachers."

The back-to-basics philosophy so popular today has been tried, Borchiver said. "It's not working."

She believes that what is missing is the opportunity for children to just talk. "Parents don't realize that if they want to raise the mental abilities of their children, they should be talking to them. As children try to explain themselves [verbally], the brain cells stretch and grow so that they can make themselves understood."

Ruth Borchiver

Parents are very rushed, she said, and there is often no time, for instance, for family dinners, where there is the opportunity to talk and exchange ideas.

One study showed that even with those who do eat together, a large percentage do so in front of the television, said Borchiver.

Another study shows that, without realizing it, a lot of parents talk in short phrases, using gestures, instead of in long sentences.

If children are cared for by nannies whose first language is not English, the problem is only compounded, she said.

This is not particularly intended to blame parents. "Lifestyles have changed, and [parents have to deal with] economic pressures and long hours."

The teaching system, "even with the best intentions," Borchiver said, is still "a receptive activity:" The teachers teach and the students are expected to listen and learn.

"Children need to talk. They need to ask questions. Curiosity is the best brain food."

Kids spending too much time watching TV

to support teachers who use innovative and creative teaching methods, she said. There must be training in the new theory of multiple intelligences (the theory that intelligence is not only the traditional math, verbal and reasoning abilities, but includes such things as musical, artistic and, for want of a better word, "social" intelligence – the ability to deal well with others) and in alternative methods of reaching kids.

A big concern, she said, is that kids spend too much time watching TV and playing video games, neither of which develops language or thinking skills.

Borchiver urged people to look hard at television. "Children learn to think episodically. This makes them easily bored. As well, they come to school with a different skill set than the schools expect."

In fact, she said, neuroscientists are coming to believe that brain patterns are changing because of the different kinds of stimulation.

So what is the answer?

Borchiver said that there must be brainstorming about how to make information and new thoughts appealing.

Must learn to interact

For instance, she said, in some schools, the first activity of the day has the students sitting in the circle, and just talking about how their day began. "Children grow accustomed to sharing their thoughts and opinions. They don't feel alone in the world. It does wonders for the rest of the day's events."

Children have to learn how to interact with others, and that doesn't mean only sitting and listening to someone else talk, she said.

They need to be able to generate ideas, and for this they need smaller classes or more teachers in the classroom.

The problems seem to be somewhat less evident in the day schools, she believes. "It is so important for children to know who they are and where they came from," she said.

Children who have graduated from day schools, especially those who have had difficulties, feel a tremendous sense of achievement. "They feel they have roots, that they are grounded. They have great coping skills."

Borchiver's ideas were presented at the Couchiching Institute on Public Affairs, held in Toronto last September, at a round table discussing alternative ways of learning. Participants included teachers, pediatricians, people involved in television, social workers, psychologists and nurses.

The only leading American university with a Jewish heart.

At the heart of Yeshiva University are its undergraduate colleges--Yeshiva College, Stern College for Women, and Sy Syms School of Business. Here students pursue a dual curriculum that combines rigorous requirements in the liberal arts and sciences with a parallel program of Jewish studies. The workload is substantial, but so are the rewards. Graduates are prominent in many fields and communal organizations.

Yeshiva is one of the leading academic centers in the U.S., rated one of the nation's top 50 research universities according to U.S. News & World Report. It is home to the Albert Einstein College of Medicine, the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law, the Ferkauf Graduate School of Psychology, and the Wurzweiler School of Social Work. Outstanding graduate and professional programs are offered at the Bernard Revel Graduate School and the Azrieli Graduate School of Jewish Education and Administration.

Rabbinic training and instruction are provided by the affiliated Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary, along with professional training of cantors and courses in Jewish liturgical music at the Philip and Sarah Belz School of Jewish Music. There are also two affiliated high schools.

How can one institution excel across such a broad range? By embodying the centuries-old commitment of the Jewish People to learning, continuity, and the advancement of human knowledge. Yeshiva University is today a unique and vital resource for the Jewish community and for the wider world.

Currently, more than 100 Canadian students are enrolled in our schools and affiliates. If you'd like to know more, we'd welcome your call.

Heschel expands with its junior high school program

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Heschel School is continuing its three-year tradition of innovative teaching as it establishes its junior high school program.

One might expect the school staff to call it innovative; however, they aren't the only ones. Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education, an American organization that encourages and supports leading edge programs in the field this fall awarded the school a grant of $175,000 (US), to be paid over three years.

Heschel is required to match each instalment.

The money is designed to help develop the junior high school program, which began this year with Grade 6, and will extend in two years to Grade 8.

The Heschel school features an integrated program. Rather than having separate hours for Hebrew studies and general studies, each course combines both. For instance, a lesson on fish would include biology and math ("How many fish are in the tank? If we took one out how many would there be?") as well as the brachah said over fish and a discussion of which fish are kosher.

A Jewish ethics course being prepared by Rachael Turkienicz, director of Judaic studies, will parallel the Grade 6 science program.

One of the most popular projects at the school is its gardening program. In the three gardens, students learn how to organize and plan a garden, what plants would grow there and what care the plants need. They then plant and tend organic vegetables and cultivated and wild flowers.

At the end of the season, the whole school has a picnic where the students and parents eat the produce.

At the same time, the students study the story of Adam and Eve, ecological laws in the Torah and the Talmud, and the responsibility of Jews toward the natural world.

For the second year, the school won the environmental award of the Toronto Atmospheric Agency for "its unique contribution to the preservation or the environment and its educational program."

All the teachers are bilingual, able to teach both general and Judaic subjects.

All the school's teachers are bilingual

One of the features of the school is its integrated arts program, led by Judith Leitner, who began a similar program some years ago at She'arim Hebrew Day School. The different arts, such as drawing, music and singing, are used in all the academic subjects.

At the beginning of the year, the youngsters, both boys and girls, create and decorate their own head coverings. This becomes, in a sense, their school "uniform."

While the Heschel School observes Jewish laws, Turkienicz said that it "sees all Jewish religious expressions as legitimate and respected."

The school also accepts the theory of multiple intelligences; that is, that everyone has different, but equally valid, innate abilities, from math to verbal to art to the ability to get along with others.

The junior high will pioneer a new integrated course in geography, Jewish and general history, Hebrew and general literature and arts of the period being studied. It will be developed and taught by school principal Baruch Rand, vice-principal Carol Baker and Leitner.

The first year deals with the ancient world and the development of Israel and Judaism, the second will deal with the medieval world and the third with America, World War II and the modern Middle East.

The Heschel School, which is in the school wing of Beth David Congregation, opened three years ago with 52 students from junior kindergarten to Grade 2. This year, the school has nearly 200 students from junior kindergarten to Grade 6.

Or Haemet Sephardic School a home for two Jewish cultures

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The program at the Or Haemet Sephardic School, which is steeped in the rich cultural heritage of Sephardi Jewry, attracts students from both the Sephardi and Ashkenazi communities.

"We strive for excellence in all areas, while at the same time, we preserve an all-important family spirit where each and every student is cared for spiritually and academically," says Sarah Wasserman, general studies principal.

Located at the Sephardic Kehila Centre, 7026 Bathurst St., just north of Steeles Ave., Or Haemet is based on an Orthodox philosophy. The school was founded a quarter of a century ago by Rabbi Amram Assayag, who serves as dean. The school has more than 200 students from kindergarten through Grade 8, with co-educational classes to Grade 4.

Because there is an academic emphasis on technology at Otr Haemet, Wasserman says, the school has a large science lab and a high-tech computer lab with banks of IBM and Mac computers.

But this is not the only focus. The school also has a beit midrash, a gym and a swimming pool, all located on campus.

"In addition to academic excellence, we place special emphasis on character development through acts of charity and kindness," Wasserman says.

'Cultivate special love of Israel, Jewish people'

"We cultivate a special love of Israel and the Jewish people and enhanced appreciation of the Jewish culture."

In the Judaic studies department, students are taught Ivrit b'Ivrit, giving them the opportunity to gain oral and written Hebrew skills.

There is also an enriched preschool program. Along with English and Hebrew vocabulary and language development, math concepts and computers are introduced to the preschoolers.

"Sephardi Hebrew pronunciation is different and more like the Hebrew that is spoken in Israel," Wasserman explains as we tour the new building, which has bright classrooms with small classes. The students wear school uniforms.

Many of the teachers are Ashkenazim and although the emphasis is on Sephardi culture and practices, the students also learn about Ashkenazi culture.

At the school there is an emphasis on lifestyle and celebrations, including the ceremonies of the Sephardi culture, Wasserman says. There are approximately 10,000 Sephardi Jews in the Toronto area, she adds.

At Or Haemet, Wasserman says, the students have a unique opportunity. "In the building, there is the Zareinu Educational Centre for multiply challenged students. Our students work in partnership with these challenged students."

The schools have Shabbat parties together, she says, and Zareinu students are invited into the regular Or Haemet classrooms where the older students help the students who have special needs.

"This sensitizes Or Haemet students to the physically and mentally challenged. As well, we help our students to understand what it is like to be challenged," Wasserman says.

She explains that there is a program where they bind a student's hands or simulate other handicaps so that students can get an idea of what a day in the life of a Zareinu child is like.

"The Zareinu students feel comfortable and some are mainstreamed into our regular school program. Having Zareinu in the building is a two-way street," she says.

The school offers an optional after-school supervised homework program from 4:45 to 5:45 to help working parents as well as give students the opportunity for additional assistance from an attending teacher. There are also extra-curricular programs including hockey, basketball, dancing and other interest programs.

In addition, Or Haemet provides an optional day care from 8 to 9 a.m. and from 4 to 5 p.m.

"At Or Haemet, every child is valued and appreciated as unique and special," says Wasserman. "Through our philosophy and teaching, we welcome all Jewish children and their families to continue their Jewish growth."

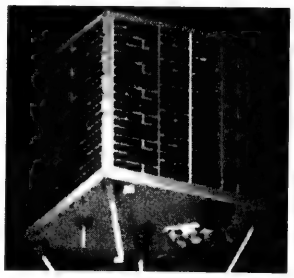
Technion's Gurwin TechSat II is an energy efficient and highly sophisticated microsatellite. Operating on a total of 21 watts of power from four solar panels, it uses less energy than your average household lamp. Yet this miniature laboratory in space is home to six permanent ongoing scientific experiments. Small, lightweight, and affordable, TechSat was developed and launched for $8 million in a perfect partnership between industry and academia. This is a fraction of the hundreds of millions of dollars it costs on average for a full-size satellite.



The Gurwin TechSat II is just one of hundreds of technological breakthroughs at Technion, a global centre for education and cutting-edge research in the fields of medicine, science, architecture and engineering.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Previously, we examined the notion of "spin" and illustrated the practice of this uniquely political art form by referring to recent developments within the Reform party. We failed to acknowledge, however, that developments cannot always be managed. Sometimes, they spin right out of control.

And so it appeared with one example we cited in last week's column. Sensing that internal pressure within the rank and file of the Reform party for a leadership review was on the rise, Preston Manning's minions claimed that it was they who first raised the issue.

Their "spin" was that grassroots Reformers were looking for an opportunity to reaffirm support for Manning, as the premier Reformer. To his supporters, the issue is about his vision of a future that must include a United Alternative to contend with the reigning Liberals.

Of course, that argument is almost entirely beside the point. Those who oppose Manning or, at the very least, deign to question his utility as party leader are operating from a completely different perspective. For the "hard-core" Reformers, any need for a United Alternative is necessitated only because Preston is unelectable. In crass terms, their contention is that Manning is the Reform party's greatest liability.

And guess what? Unpublished national polls commissioned by the Reform party over the last 18 months confirm their suspicions. More to the point, Ontario voters – the ultimate target of the Reform party – mention Manning as the single, most important factor for not supporting the Reform party.

If all this is true, and party insiders assure us it is, what's really going on? The party's national chairman Dick Harris, a backbencher from B.C., is resigning, and a former Reformer, Jake Hoeppner is challenging Manning for the leadership; and everyone is blaming it on the fight surrounding the endorsement of the United Alternative.

This is spin. Manning's supporters have successfully convinced everyone within Reform and without, that this battle is all about the soul of the Reform movement. Manning has staked his leadership on the success of the UA gambit and either "you're with me or 'against' me."

Manning's achievement is in having shifted the debate away from his competency as leader of the faltering movement to a contest about the merits of a particular vision of the future.

CJA passes campaign goal

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The annual Combined Jewish Appeal has already passed its campaign goal of $3,250,000.

As of mid-January, a total of $3,346,000 had been raised and there is more pledge money still to be collected.

"We are showing increases in every single dollar division," says Gerry Koffman, the CJA's executive director. "We have 147 new gifts either from people who may be new to the community or who have never given before.

"We also received 191 gifts from people we haven't heard from in at least a couple of years."

Koffman attributes the campaign's success primarily to the fact that a target was set for the first time. "Our goal was based on real current and unmet needs.

"We were able to get across to our community that the CJA campaign helps the needy and builds community."

He notes that Winnipeg has one of the highest contribution rates to the CJA per capita in North America.

Koffman also gives credit to the campaign team whom he describes as the most cohesive group of canvassers he has ever worked with. "We really felt like a team," he says.

Comment What's in a name?

By JEFF ROSEN
Internet Editor

What's in a name? Plenty it seems when it involves the new year.

For the past few months, everyone has been eagerly anticipating the arrival of the new millennium …century…decade and year. It's been 2000 this, 2000 that.

Now the new year has finally arrived (minus the Y2K computer bug!) But hold on. Why has everyone become so formal all of a sudden?

Up to now there has been no mention of the calendar's true age. It's simply been referred to as 1999, '98, '97, and so forth. All of a sudden we're speaking in the thousands.

At least for the sake of consistency we should stop being so awed by the new year. It's simply 20-0-0.

Well maybe we will start calling it so once we get more comfortable living in a new century and adjust our vocabulary accordingly.

Not only would it be more consistent, but would solve the problem of what to call the new decade.

We had the '80s, the '90s, and now – it's the Oh-Ohs ('0-0s)!

City of Vaughan — The City Above Toronto

Public Notice
SIDEWALK SNOW CLEARING

Residents are required to ensure that snow and ice are cleared from the City sidewalk abutting their property within 24 hours after a fall of snow per By-law #300-93. Notwithstanding this, the Council of the City of Vaughan has approved a City-wide sidewalk snow clearing program to assist residents during periods of heavy snowfall. However, this new service does not alleviate residents from maintaining the sidewalk in a safe condition as required under By-law #300-93.

Owners and tenants of property in the City of Vaughan are also hereby notified that By-law #358-86 prohibits the building, placement or maintaining of posts, fences, trees, hedges, retaining wall and wooden or cement curbing on all public road allowance on any roadway in the municipality. The road allowance usually begins at a point behind the public sidewalk.

Further information may be obtained by contacting the Public Works Department - Roads Division at (905) 832-8562.

DEPOSITING SNOW ON ROADWAY

Owners and tenants of property in the City of Vaughan are hereby notified that Ontario Highway Traffic Act, Section 181 prohibits the placing of snow or ice on a roadway. Please ensure that any snow removed from your property is not placed on the roadway.

VEHICLE PARKING DURING WINTER SNOW CLEARING OPERATIONS

To allow for a more efficient flow of traffic during winter storm conditions, the City of Vaughan will be actively enforcing its "No Parking" restrictions as permitted under By-law #1-96. Section 4, subsection (7) of the by-law states: "No person shall park a vehicle on a highway so as to interfere with the clearing of snow."

In addition, the by-law also prohibits overnight parking of vehicles on any street between the hours of 2:00 am and 6:00 am. It is also an offence to park any part of a vehicle over the sidewalk. This is for pedestrian safety and to help facilitate sidewalk snow clearing operations. Owners are hereby advised that any vehicle found in violation of this by-law shall be tagged and/or towed away. For complete information on parking restrictions within the City of Vaughan, please contact the By-law Enforcement Division at (905) 832-8505.

Sixth Annual CJN Purim Art Contest

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 16. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small or too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, February 21, 2000. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: Children will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 3, 2000.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 16, 2000. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

JCS launches programs for grads, professionals

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) has introduced a new line of programming for graduate students and young professionals aged 22 to 30.

"Graduate students are matured and are at a different stage of their life than when they were undergraduate students," said Jon Rogers, a member of the JCS board of directors.

"Professionals have a hard time meeting other Jewish people and finding other Jews in the workplace," he added.

While adequate programming exists for students during their undergraduate years, few programs are offered between the time young Jews graduate and the time they join a synagogue when they marry and have a family, Rogers said.

In June, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto recognized this need by giving JCS a grant to plan programs for this age group.

Shayna Allen, a 26-year-old graduate of Nova Scotia's Acadia University, was hired in July to coordinate GAP – programs for graduate students and young professionals aimed at filling this gap in programming.

In September, she sent out about 100 e-mail messages and 75 mailings to graduate students and young professionals, explaining the new program. Within two weeks, she was receiving about 30 responses each day.

In planning programs, one of her biggest challenges was the fact that the graduate students and young professionals are scattered across the city.

Her solution: "We brought our program to them."

In the first week of October, Allen held a wine and cheese party for graduates at the University of Toronto, and later held the same event at York University for its graduate students. She also held a night of pool playing and shmoozing for young professionals, at a downtown bar.

While Allen and Rogers planned the initial programs, they wanted to encourage participants to start coordinating events.

Allen sent out an e-mail message in mid-November asking for volunteers, and at the beginning of December, a group of four graduate students and six young professionals gathered for a three-hour brainstorming.

According to Allen and Rogers, the volunteers had a ton of ideas.

"They were passionate and they even motivated us," Rogers said.

One graduate student pointed out the need for 12-month programming because many graduate students work on theses throughout the year, have work terms, or study for more months than undergraduate students. Also, young professionals tend to have less vacation time than undergraduate students.

Shayna Allen

Addressing this need for year-round programming, a movie night was held for graduate students and professionals on Dec. 25 – in the middle of the winter break.

At the planning meeting, a graduate student suggested that GAP programs should include a strong focus on social action.

So every second Tuesday for 12 weeks, starting Jan. 18, graduates and young professionals will meet at Beth Sholom Synagogue to set up beds, serve food and socialize with the homeless, as part of the city-wide Out of the Cold program.

The beauty of this activity is that "you're doing community work but you still get to socialize and meet other people in your age group," said Rogers.

At the meeting, the group also decided that each month will feature a major program suitable for everyone in the city and with the goal of attracting between 50 and 100 people.

Birthright Israel

This month's major program is a Shabbat dinner on Jan. 21, and next month's will be the Birthright Israel trip. In March, everyone is invited to a Raptors game followed by a Purim party.

At the meeting, they also decided to have supplementary programs for smaller groups of about 20, such as the GAP book club, which recently met for the first time.

Over the last four months, Allen has gathered contact information on 300 graduates and young professionals, which she stores in a thick, black binder.

"I have got to get a new binder – it's so full," she said during our interview at the JCS Bathurst Street office.

Rogers said he hopes that by the end of the year, this database will have grown to 500 people.

For more information about GAP programs, e-mail gapprogrammes@hotmail.com or call Shayna at 416-785-1465.

Graduate students and young professionals watch a Buffalo Bills game at a November GAP program.

New drugs to help with treatment of dementia

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A host of new drugs on the horizon for treatment of some types of dementia is good reason for optimism, said Dr. Morris Freedman.

Freedman, a behaviour neurologist and a senior scientist at Rotman Research Institute, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, said that although only one drug (donepezil) is approved for this purpose so far in Canada, there are others on the way.

Since treatment by drugs is now possible, it is more important than ever for a correct diagnosis to be made. Not all forms of dementia respond to medication in the same way.

Though Alzheimer's disease makes up from 50 to 75 percent of dementia cases, and affects mainly the elderly, other types are getting more attention.

Scientists are looking at vascular dementia which is usually the result of a stroke; frontotemporal dementia, which affects younger ages and can cause personality changes; and Lewy Body dementia, which is coming under increased scrutiny, Freedman said.

Referring to the 275 patients a year he sees in his clinic, Freedman said the majority have Alzheimer's disease and only a minority of them are improving with the drug donepezil (aricept).

"Most of my patients with Alzheimer's are on the drug and they are the same after six months, or worse," he said. "Most of them do not benefit."

"It used to be that the general public was reluctant to mention Alzheimer's disease and lumped all cases of senility together," he said.

But new knowledge indicates that from eight to 25 percent of dementia cases are actually frontotemporal. These patients often become rude or begin shoplifting, and experience a loss of normal social restraints.

Lewy Body dementia is often confused with Pick's disease. However, autopsies have shown that the two diseases are different.

Those with Lewy Body dementia are subject to fluctuations in their cognitive abilities. They are impaired at certain times of the day, have hallucinations, and exhibit some symptoms of Parkinson's disease.

Though he does not know the answer to the question of whether Jewish people are more prone to dementia, Freedman said there is no doubt that Jews are not "protected" against it.

Freedman said there is only a minority of dementia patients who carry genes that can have an effect on their children.

Volunteers, young and old, who are healthy, and patients who have dementia, are needed. Call the Rotman Research Institute, 416-785-2500, ext. 2080.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

I often get a lot of questions about commonly used food additives and preservatives. Here are some of your most frequent questions.

Q. What is MSG (monosodium glutamate) and is it safe?

A. The Centre for Science in the Public Interest considers MSG to be generally safe, yet something that certain people should avoid.

MSG is a flavour enhancer. Some people are sensitive to MSG particularly in large amounts and they may suffer headaches, nausea, burning sensations in the upper body, and sometimes more serious asthmatic reactions.

If you are sensitive to MSG, you should also avoid the following foods as they also contain glutamates: natural flavouring, hydrolyzed vegetable (plant) protein and tomatoes.

MSG is a natural product, it is the sodium portion of an amino acid.

Q. I see ascorbic acid listed on many of the juice boxes that I give my children. What is this and is it safe?

A. Ascorbic acid is very simply vitamin C. It is used in products like cereal, cured meats and fruit drinks, as an antioxidant, colour stabilizer and vitamin. It is therefore a safe ingredient.

Alzheimer's Awareness Month programs planned

TORONTO —A series of public information sessions are being offered to raise awareness about Alzheimer's disease.

About 25,000 Torontonians have been diagnosed with Alzheimer's.

During Alzheimer Awareness Month, an open house is to be held Jan. 19 at the Alzheimer Society of Toronto, 2323 Yonge St., Suite 500, from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m.

Other public meetings will be held at Northern District Library, 40 Orchard View Blvd., at 2 p.m., Jan. 20; and at Cummer Lodge, 205 Cummer Ave., North York, at 7 p.m. on Jan. 26.

The Society is also hoping to raise $120,000 at the 10th annual Hy and Zel's Walk for Memories on Jan. 29, beginning and ending at BCE Place. More than 500 people are expected to take part in a 30-minute, four-kilometre walk through the PATH system of downtown Toronto.

This year, the national campaign is called Alzheimer Disease: Facing the Millennium. A new brochure entitled Ways to Help – Assisting Families Living with Alzheimer's Disease is now available to the public through the Society, 416-322-6560.

Alzheimer's disease is a degenerative brain disorder that affects 300,000 Canadians, the society says. By the year 2031, it is estimated that more than 750,000 Canadians will have Alzheimer's disease and related dementia.

Syria 'reassessing' continued talks

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In a surprise announcement, Syria said on Monday that it was "reassessing" its plans to go back to the United States for a new round of talks with Israel scheduled for this week.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak, caught by surprise by the announcement, issued a statement saying that "we know nothing about a plan to postpone the round of talks. If the Syrians want to postpone them, we don't have a problem with that. When they decide they are ready, they should let us know."

U.S. sources said they saw the Syrian announcement, which was accompanied by attacks on Israel in the government-controlled press in Damascus, as a muscle-flexing move.

The Syrian complaint focuses on Israel's refusal to commit to a full withdrawal from the Golan before proceeding to other issues.

"It appears that the political atmosphere created after the second round of talks does not include any signs that the coming round will be decisive or that there will be fundamental progress," a Damascus Radio commentator said – referring to the question of an agreement on a full Israeli withdrawal from the entire Golan Heights.

U.S. National Security Council spokesperson David Leavy and sources in Barak's office said they expected the talks to go ahead as planned this week.

"We continue to have conversations with both parties, the Israelis and the Syrians," Leavy said. "Those discussions are ongoing and we are still planning for talks to resume."

He said the new round would be held in the United States, but no final decision had been made on whether they would take place in Shepherdstown, W.V.

"I think the Syrians were disappointed that the last round of talks did not achieve their objective of getting an Israeli commitment to withdraw fully from the Golan," said a Damascus-based diplomat.

Syrian officials said Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Shara and U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright talked on the telephone Sunday, discussing developments in the Syrian-Israeli talks.

"The conversation covered the outcome of the previous round of talks in Shepherdstown and the horizons of the peace process," one official said.

Syrian officials say the previous round led only to agreement on "minor procedural issues," including the formation of four committees to tackle the demarcation of borders, water rights, security arrangements and normal peaceful ties.

They accuse Israel of blocking the activities of the borders committee, which is to discuss Israel's withdrawal from the Golan and define the future borders between the two countries.

"The Israelis wanted to make progress on the activities of the committees dealing with normal peaceful ties and the security arrangements, and to abandon any progress on activities of the borders committee," one official said.

A possible peace timeline

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The following list identifies some of the issues that would need to be addressed in the implementation of a peace treaty between Israel and Syria.

The selected issues are presented in a non-chronological order. Implementing them would likely take place in stages and over a lengthy period of time.

- end of state of war, declaration of state of peace;
- confirmation/establishment of international boundary – specify a date by which this would become effective;
- establishment and phased implementation of security arrangements;
- completion of phased withdrawal/relocation of Israeli armed forces – possibly between 16 and 48 months;
- establishment of diplomatic relations – possibly 30 days upon completion of Israeli withdrawal;
- exchange of resident ambassadors – possibly 30 days upon completion of Israeli withdrawal;
- removal of economic boycotts – possible entry into force at end of first phase;
- other elements of normal, peaceful relations;
- enactment of implementing legislation and repeal of inconsistent legislation – possibly three months;
- notifications of declaration of peace under various multilateral conventions.

Barak defers West Bank withdrawal

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will not resume its withdrawal from the West Bank this week, Prime Minister Ehud Barak decided last week.

Political sources in Jerusalem say that the Palestinian Authority (PA) and Israel have reached a tacit agreement allowing a three-week delay of the withdrawal. However, PA officials denied having reached such an agreement, and denounced the delay.

Barak wants to put off the pullback until a full picture of the negotiations with the Palestinians becomes clear, Israeli sources indicated.

The next withdrawal, which will be the third and final stage of the Sharm el Sheikh agreement's "second phase," was scheduled for this week on Thursday.

Israel is required by the arrangement to transfer to the Palestinian Authority 5.1 percent of West Bank land classified as "B" areas (under Israeli security control) and one percent of "C" areas (under exclusive Israeli control).

After the withdrawal, these will become "A" areas under full Palestinian control. Israel has agreed to consider Palestinian requests before designating lands for withdrawal, but has also made it clear that there will be no withdrawal from the Abu Dis area, on the outskirts of Jerusalem.

Barak is expected to meet PA Chairman Yasser Arafat and U.S. President Bill Clinton in Washington this week. The three-way discussion will assess prospects for reaching an Israel-Palestinian framework accord.

Barak and Arafat were to bring to their meeting with Clinton draft framework agreements which each side is currently formulating independently.

The presentation of such drafts in Washington will underline the fact that the process clarifying issues has been completed, and that the gaps between the sides can now be identified and attempts made to narrow them.

Though senior Palestinian spokespeople have been skeptical about the chances of reaching a framework agreement before the mid-February target date, Arafat intends to submit an outline of a peace agreement to Clinton, and detailed proposals for the pact's implementation. This outline, Arafat confidant Nabil Abu-Rudeineh says, will emphasize Palestinian positions on Jerusalem and West Bank settlements.

Chief PA negotiator Dr. Saeb Erekat said last week that while no progress had been made in talks on this phase of the redeployment issue, the expectation nevertheless was that Israel would try to meet the scheduled timetable.

Israel's adherence to deadlines, Erekat said, would substantiate its pledges that the Palestinians won't be hurt by the resumption of negotiations on the Syrian track.

REFORM CONGREGATION SEEKS ASSISTANCE

A dynamic Reform congregation in Vancouver, British Columbia, is looking for an exciting energetic and knowledgeable individual who will assist the Rabbi in many aspects of congregational life. The 550 family congregation encompasses both liberal and traditional elements. It is completely egalitarian, yet also has 2 days of Rosh Hashanna. Conversions are ke'dat halacha, and Jewish identity is established through matrilineal decent or conversion.

In addition, the successful candidate will also serve as a madrich and a shaliach tzibor on a 15-20% time basis for a new suburban congregation.

Irving, he continued bluntly, is a Holocaust denier: "By this I mean he denies that the Nazis planned and carried out the systematic murder of millions of Jews – in particular, though by no means exclusively, by the use of homicidal gas chambers, and in particular, though by no means exclusively, at Auschwitz."

As Irving almost visibly seethed, Rampton recalled a speech Irving had given to an audience in Calgary, in September 1991, a speech, he said, that "conveys a message about his true views and attitudes.

"'I don't see any reason to be tasteful about Auschwitz,'" Rampton quoted Irving as saying. "'It's baloney. It's a legend.

"'Once we admit the fact that it was a brutal slave labour camp and a large number of people did die, as large numbers of people died elsewhere in the war, why believe the rest of the baloney?

"'I say, quite tastelessly in fact, that more women died on the back seat of Edward Kennedy's car at Chappaquiddick than ever died in a gas chamber in Auschwitz.'"

Wearing a navy-blue pinstriped suit and grey tie, Irving claimed that Lipstadt's assault on his integrity had caused "very real damage to my professional existence."

In his long and rambling opening statement, which took up most of the first day's proceedings, Irving, author of 30 books on World War II, vehemently denied that he was a Holocaust denier or an anti-Semite.

Some of his best friends have been Jewish, he said, as he portrayed himself as the victim of an international Jewish conspiracy that has monitored him in an attempt to strip him of his credibility and reputation and ultimately destroy him.

Lipstadt and Penguin were not alone "in their determination to destroy my career and to vandalize my legitimacy as a historian. They were part of an organized international endeavor at achieving precisely that.

"I have seen the papers. I have copies of the documents. I will show them to this court. I know how they did it and I now know why."

He alleged that in 1992 he had been expelled from Canada – he has also been banned from Germany, Austria, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa – on the basis of documents "blackening my name" which had been handed to Canadian authorities by "an unofficial body based in London" – a reference to the Board of Deputies of British Jews.

Irving said he would be presenting expert evidence from a professor of sociology at a leading American university on "the relationship between the world's Jewish communities and the rest of us.

"The Jewish community, their fame and fortunes, play a central role in these proceedings," he continued.

"I finally realized that I was the target of a hidden international attempt to exclude me, if that could be done, from publishing further works of history."

He continued: "It appears that these bodies, which are also embedded in our society in Britain and elsewhere, have seen their task, unbidden, as being to spy upon members of our society, maintain dossiers on us all, and to deploy those dossiers when necessary to smite those of us of whom they disapprove."

These "disturbing and sleazy" dossiers, he said, were explicitly designed "to hold such material on the subjects' personal lives, criminal records, credit delinquencies, marital difficulties, dietary habits and even sexual proclivities.

"It is not anti-Semitic to reveal this," he insisted. "The spying and smearing by these bodies goes on against Jew and non-Jew alike.

"I can think only of the wartime Gestapo and its offshoots in Nazi-occupied Europe as a body engaged in similar practices," Irving said.

He was particularly incensed to be branded a Holocaust denier, which, he said, had the effect of creating "a pariah, an outcast from normal society. It is a verbal yellow star."

Lipstadt, at the epicenter of the storm, sat silent and impassive throughout the proceedings, in a black pantsuit, with a vivid orange scarf draped over her shoulders.

As the drama swirled about her, she glanced at her laptop computer on the desk before her or at the judge, directly in front of her. She was surrounded by some 20 members of her defence team, seated in four rows behind her.

Where will the border be?

In compiling this document, Biran received the assistance of the IDF's planning and intelligence services. The person who helped him on air force matters was Dan Halutz, who will be the Israel Air Force's next commander.

In the spring of 1994, on the eve of his appointment as head of the IDF's Central Command, Biran submitted his paper to the chief of staff.

Those who were closely familiar with this document observed that Barak, at the time, adopted a position that was more aggressive than that taken by Biran. The recommendations of the Biran report were never publicized.

On October 7, 1994, after speaking with then chief of staff Barak, Ha'aretz publicized the IDF's recommendation the border "should be beyond the cliff overlooking the Hulah Valley."

It should be pointed out that, in accordance with this line, most of the settlements on the Golan Heights would be excluded from the territory that would remain in Israeli hands.

The senior commanders of the IDF understand today that it will be impossible to obtain an agreement in which the new border with Syria will lie along the cliffs of the Golan Heights.

Therefore, the members of the IDF's general staff are now saying that, from the military standpoint, there is only one question that must be asked: Will the IDF remain on the cliff overlooking the Hulah Valley or will it have to descend into that valley?

If the IDF is forced to go down into the Hulah Valley, there is no difference, militarily speaking, between the June 4, 1967 lines and the international boundary drawn in 1923.

By implication too, the planning division of the general staff is choosing to regard the water resources problem not as a military question.

However, this position is an evasion of the real issue. Water – especially that of Israel's main (and only) reservoir, the Sea of Galilee – is not some irrelevant military question, but is, in fact, a central strategic problem of national proportions.

As an "antidote" to a boundary line in the Hulah Valley, the IDF is demanding effective security arrangements, which are far more important than symbols of normalization between Syria and Israel.

Since we can forget about remaining on the cliff, we must see to it that the security arrangements are stringent.

The Israeli negotiating team has begun to believe that an alternative can be found to an early-warning station on Mount Hermon.

In contrast with this attitude, senior commanders in the IDF are taking a tougher line and are claiming that there is no real alternative to a ground station.

There are still quite a number of top brass who feel that Israel's acceptance of reciprocity in security arrangements is mistaken. They are saying that the arrangements should be asymmetrical and should favour Israel, which will be losing strategic depth when it pulls out of the Golan Heights.

The Week in Israel

Jan. 10

• In the latest round of peace talks in Ramallah, Israel rejected a Palestinian demand that the Jewish state permit the return of millions of Palestinian refugees and compensate them for their lost property and suffering.

Jan. 11

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak returned from Washington to confront growing opposition to a withdrawal from the Golan Heights as part of a peace deal with Syria. (More than 100,000 people opposed to any withdrawal from the Golan Heights held a Monday night protest rally in Rabin Square in Tel Aviv.)

• Druze residents on the Golan Heights are threatening to sue Israel if the Jewish state withdraws from the heights. The suit would be filed on behalf of Druze who would wind up in Syria and those who would remain in Israel, claiming damages for loss of employment and land and for emotional harm. About 17,000 Druze live on the Golan.

Jan.12

• Pope John Paul II's pilgrimage to Israel March 20 to 26, will include visits to the Western Wall and the Al-Aksa Mosque in Jerusalem. He also plans to meet with the leaders of Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority.

Jan. 13

• Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy announced that King Mohammed of Morocco agreed to visit Israel. Levy met with the king in Morocco, the first Israeli to do so since the death of the king's father, Hassan, last July.

• Israel freed 27 prisoners held in Lebanon, including at least two members of Hezbollah. The releases may be part of a larger prisoner exchange.

Jan. 14

• Attorney General Elyakim Rubenstein announced that the police will probe the legality of the cash gifts that President Ezer Weizman received from French businessman Edouard Saroussi. Weizman said he "welcomed" the probe if it will help bring out the truth.

The faces behind the bombings

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

We all see the pictures in newspapers and on television whenever a terrorist bombing in Israel goes off. And we all see the statistics the newspapers inevitably publish, telling us, for instance, 27 Palestinians died in suicide bombings that killed 175 people in five years.

But who are the people behind these numbers? Who is left behind when the dust settles and the media move off to other stories?

The Bombing, airing on The Passionate Eye on CBC Newsworld Jan. 23 at 7 p.m. attempts to put faces to the people involved in the bombing in Jerusalem in September 1997, by talking with the families of those who died – both victim and terrorist.

In Nablus, home of the three suicide bombers who killed five people – including three teenage girls – we meet the parents of one of the terrorists.

She bears no grudge against Israel or Jews and can't understand what possessed her son. "What are the Jews guilty of? They're just like us. Their mothers break their backs to raise their children too."

"It's a sin," her husband says about suicide bombing. "It's a sacrilege."

Israeli reprisal to terrorism is harsh. Israeli police destroy or seal the houses of the terrorists, evicting the family. Brothers are arrested and likely face torture. The entire village is sometimes sealed off for weeks. Many relatives of the terrorists are angry at this as they feel that they're being punished for something they didn't do.

The families of the bombing victims tend to have different reactions. The parents of one teenage girl who was injured but survived the bombing, seek to make sense of the whole tragedy by meeting with the family of one of the suicide bombers. They visit, talk, eat and drink tea. On the surface, of course, this resolves nothing, but maybe by meeting their opposite, each side can put a face to the enemy and see them as humans too.

One mother of a 14-year-old victim decided to leave Israel and went to Britain. Israel, she feels, betrayed her by not protecting her daughter. She is overwhelmed by guilt that she couldn't save her daughter. "The horror of leaving her in a drawer of a fridge – there's no life after that," she says.

This documentary, produced by Noga Communications in Israel, is for the most part, neutral. It looks at the aftermath of a terrorist bombing on both sides, realizing that both the families of victims and perpetrators suffer equally.

Dr. Laura reveals Canadian connection

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Dr. Laura Schlessinger revealed an interesting Canadian connection recently on her show.

Schlessinger is the Los-Angeles based syndicated radio talk show host heard internationally by some 20 million listeners.

Seems that Dr. Laura went far afield when choosing a rabbi to conduct an Orthodox Jewish conversion for her husband and son about two years ago.

She and her kin came all the way to Ottawa and to that city's Rabbi Reuven Bulka for the conversion ceremony. In a passing reference on air, she praised Rabbi Bulka and referred to him as her personal spiritual counsellor.

Reached at Ottawa's Machzikei Hadas Synagogue, where he serves as spiritual leader, Rabbi Bulka, who has written 31 books, explains that he first heard of Dr. Laura about two years ago, after tuning in her show on local radio station CFRA, on which he also has a program.

After sending copies of their books to each other they met soon after while Bulka was on a trip to Los Angeles. Shortly afterwards, she and her family came to Ottawa for the conversions.

Known for her support of traditional family values, Dr. Laura metes out quick and often harsh judgements, and ends each show by encouraging her audience, "Now go and do the right thing."

Rabbi Bulka notes that she has one of the top-rated shows on radio. "She certainly didn't get to where she is by being a dumb-dumb," he says. "She's a very perceptive lady. She picks things up quicker than a Hoover."

Does he always agree with her? "I don't think there's anybody in this world who agrees with another person all the time. I don't think that Dr. Laura would agree with everything Dr. Laura said five years ago. We develop."

Eichmann trial airs on TVO

'I am guilty of organizing deportations'

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Only one man has ever been executed by an Israeli court – Adolf Eichmann, a Nazi bureaucrat who did his job so well his superiors called him "a qualified specialist."

Initially in charge of Jewish emigration from Austria, by 1941 SS Lt.-Col. Eichmann was overseeing the mass deportation of Jews from Eastern Europe.

In a well-documented account, Eichmann was tracked down in Argentina by the Mossad, kidnapped, and tried in Jerusalem in 1961.

TVO is airing The Specialist on Human Edge, Jan. 26 at 10 p.m. and again Jan. 30 at midnight.

Inspired by Hannah Arendt's Eichmann in Jerusalem, The Specialist compresses over 300 hours of trial footage into a compact 130-minute courtroom drama filled with dramatic testimony, self-important prosecutors and noisy interruptions from the spectators.

Eichmann sits alone in his prisoner's dock, rarely showing emotion apart from a constant nervous tick. He shuffles through leaves of documents with the precision of a well-trained desk clerk. He stands up with military attentiveness to answer the prosecutor's and the judges' questions, and for the most part is unevasive in his answers.

The Zundels of the world should take note – he never denies the Holocaust; in fact he calls it "one of the greatest crimes in the history of mankind." And he admits to four occasions where he witnessed the execution of Jews and other victims.

For his defence, Eichmann uses the standard "following orders" argument.

"I was an instrument of superior powers," he says. "I never tried to shirk my responsibility but I didn't act willingly."

In fact, he says, he repeatedly asked for a transfer but it was denied because he did such a good job.

Eichmann claims he was but a civil servant – taking orders from some of the most notorious Nazis, including Himmler and Heydrich. He had no idea, he says, the transports he so efficiently organized took Jews to death camps.

He admits being at the infamous Wannsee Conference where the "final solution" was engineered. He was asked what was discussed at this conference.

In his calm, detached manner he rose to the microphone and said, "different methods of killing." This elicited a strong eruption from the spectators.

Eichmann claims that at Wannsee he was merely taking minutes and was not involved in any decisions.

When asked by the prosecutor if he was guilty or innocent, Eichmann replies: "I am guilty of organizing deportations. Remorse changes nothing, it won't bring anyone back to life."

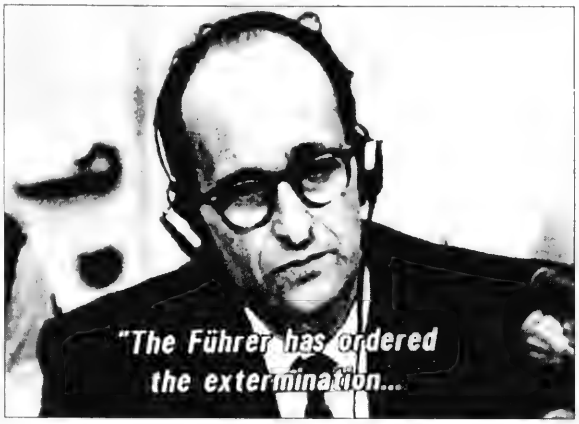
Eichmann most likely knew the moment the Mossad captured him that his fate was a fait accompli. Despite his claims, documents show – although not mentioned in this documentary – that he was far more an accomplice to the atrocities than he admits.

After the initial victories in the U.S.S.R., the number of Soviet prisoners wasn't reaching expectations. Eichmann knew that Himmler needed Jews to replace the Soviet labourers in Auschwitz and did everything he could to expedite their transportation.

Other documents show he took an active role in organizing the deportation of Slovakian Jews deemed "unfit for work," knowing full well what happened to "unfit" Jews in Auschwitz.

In this sense, Eichmann truly was the "qualified specialist."

The Specialist is a well-edited documentary highlighting what is perhaps the most famous trial in Israeli history. This is a historical document well-worth watching.



Adolf Eichmann delivered his answers with military precision.

Jewish presence in Split dates back to Roman times

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

SPLIT, Croatia — Roman, Venetian, French and Austrian invaders have come and gone, leaving imprints on this stately city on the magnificent Dalmatian coast.

But of all the people who have passed through Split, none but the Jews have remained permanently.

There has been a Jewish presence in Split for about 2,000 years, according to Zoran Morpurgo, president of the Jewish community and scion of an old Sephardi family which established itself here almost 400 years ago.

Jewish traders arrived in Split, known also as Spalato, with Roman legions. When archeologists excavated Salona, a suburb of Split, they found oil lamps engraved with menorahs.

In the intervening centuries, Jews were subjected to anti-Semitic edicts, but these had no lasting effect on Jewish settlement. On the eve of World War II, 280 Jews lived in Split, the main port on the Adriatic Sea.

The emergence of a pro-Nazi independent state in Croatia in 1941, following Germany's invasion of Yugoslavia, brought devastating consequences for Croatian Jewry.

Jews in Split, however, were spared the worst aspects of the Ustashe reign of terror. They were protected from deportation by the Italian army, which occupied Dalmatia.

Zoran Morpurgo

Yet the Italian occupation was anything but benign. In June 1942, a band of blackshirts raided the 16th-century synagogue on Zidovski prolaz (Jewish passage). They flung prayer books, Torahs and ancient documents into the street, setting the pile alight.

When Benito Mussolini's fascist republic collapsed in 1943, the Germans captured Split, and Jews were deported to concentration camps from which some never returned.

The Jewish community, though hit hard by these disasters, has managed to survive. Today, 150 Jews reside in Split, whose walled medieval centre was built around the stately ruins of Diocletian's palace.

Named after a Roman emperor, the palace is doubtless the pride of Split. Facing the harbor and the Riva, the waterfront promenade lined by palm trees and cafes, it is an imposing structure which personifies the spirit of the city.

So massive was the palace that the medieval quarter, which bears a remarkable resemblance to old Jaffa, arose within its walls.

The highlight of Diocletian's palace, graced by Roman columns and arches, is the Peristyle, a colonnaded square dominated by a neo-Romanesque cathedral and bell-tower.

The cobble-stone streets and lanes within the palace boundaries are narrow and altogether charming, being full of art galleries, boutiques and shops. They are tailor-made for strolling.

The synagogue, found on the second floor of an inconspicuous building which can easily be missed, was restored three years ago. It is an unprepossessing shul, small and compact, but rich in history.

During the civil war in the early 1990s which fragmented Yugoslavia into several new states, Split was besieged by Serbian forces, but never shelled.

And so the beauty of this unforgettable city was never sullied.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

BOOKSTORE BEGINS SERIES OF READINGS

Facing increased competition from the mega-bookstores, many smaller bookstores have been going the way of the dodo bird. One of the latest casualties is the superb Children's Bookstore on Yonge Street, north of Eglinton, which, lamentably, closes at the end of this month.

Jewish bookstores may be somewhat immune to the mega-competition because of the somewhat exclusive nature of their niche-market. However, it's nice to hear that the newly expanded Israel's bookstore on Eglinton Avenue, just west of Bathurst Street, has instituted a series of readings. The events are bound to expose more people to more books.

The series begins with Prof. Menachem Kellner of Haifa University, author of Must a Jew Believe Anything?, on Jan. 29, 8:30 p.m. Children's author Kathy Kacer, who wrote The Secret of Gabi's Dresser, is slated for Jan. 23, 2 p.m. Refreshments will be served.

Other scheduled authors include Vera Schiff, Malka Marom and Rhea Tregebov. A book club meeting, led by Ralph Wintrob, is planned for Sunday Feb. 13. Topic: For the Relief of Unbearable Urges. 416-256-1010.

Music, Drama, Literature

• Eight poems by Donia Clenman, inspired by the Group of Seven, have been set to music by composer-pianist Walter Buczynski, who performs them with soprano Lorna MacDonald at the McMichael Gallery, Kleinburg. Jan. 19, 8 p.m. 905-893-1121.

• Susan Glickman, Nora Gold, Camille Hernandez-Ramdwar, Mansa, Makeda Silvera and Rhea Tregebov share the stage during A Gathering of Riches: Readings by Jewish and Women of Colour Writers. Bloor JCC, Thursday Jan. 20, 7:30 p.m. $5.416-924-6211.

• Cantor Benjamin Maissner conducts the Canadian premiere performance of a new choral work for Shabbat Shira by Jewish composer Michael Isaacson. The concert features 100 children. Jan. 23, 3 p.m. Holy Blossom Temple. $5. 416-789-3291, ext. 224.

• Workmen's Circle presents a Yiddishland Café evening, Borekhabo! – Welcome to Contemporary Yiddish Song, featuring Stella Walker, David Wall and Sageev Oore. 417 Lawrence Ave. W. $12 in advance, $15 at door. Jan. 30, 7:30 p.m. 416-635-0720 or 416-787-2081.

In the Spotlight: One of my most hilarious half-hours in recent years consisted of a telephone interview with the legendary American borscht-belt comic Jackie Mason.

The king of Jewish comedy opened a new one-man show on Broadway recently, Much Ado About Everything, which was the focus of a trenchant article in The Forward, the English-language weekly on Jewish affairs, published in New York.

Actually, the show wasn't entirely new: Mason had tried it out in London, England, and in Toronto before its New York debut. Word from London was that it was riotously funny if more than a little risqué, especially the comic's attempts at ethnic humor.

The word from Toronto? I don't know. Unfortunately, tickets were sold out long in advance and reviewers, in any case, were barred from attending.

The Forward piece, by Donald Weber, recounts Mason's ancient feud with Ed Sullivan and pronounces that Mason's "truly subversive imitation" of Sullivan on stage qualifies as revenge of the "he-who-laughs-last" variety.

Fans may recall that Mason was practically blacklisted from the entertainment industry after invoking Sullivan's wrath for an ambiguous finger gesture that he improvised on live television in 1964.

Weber viewed Mason's career-ruining gesture of 35 years ago, courtesy of New York's Museum of Television and Radio. He concluded that the comic lost his composure during a difficult live moment and "as a result, he takes revenge, gets even with the ghost of Ed Sullivan" every night.

Jews protest Iranian visit

By DOUGLAS DAVIS

LONDON — About 50 Jews gathered in central London last week to protest a visit by the first Iranian cabinet minister to make an official trip to Britain since the 1979 Islamic Revolution.

Holding a banner reading, Free the Iranian Jews, the demonstrators held a vigil Monday, opposite the entrance to Downing Street where Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi paid a courtesy call on Prime Minister Tony Blair.

"This is a simple humanitarian plea for 13 people who have been picked up and held in Iranian jails for nearly a year," said Eldred Tabachnik, president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, who joined the demonstration. 'We are saying, That is too long; let them go.'"

It is not known whether Kharrazi saw the demonstrators, but he is reported to have received a far warmer welcome from Blair and from his British counterpart, Robin Cook, who launched the rapprochement with Iran some 18 months ago.

Britain and Iran last week signed a joint declaration to strengthen diplomatic ties, promote trade, and fight terrorism and drug trafficking.

The agreement, which put aside their differences about human rights, came at the end of Kharrazi's visit to London.

Last May, Britain and Iran exchanged ambassadors after a 20-year break in relations. The two countries agreed to restore diplomatic relations after Iranian officials agreed to withdraw their support for efforts to execute a fatwa, or religious ruling, against British author Salman Rushdie, which was issued by the late Iranian spiritual leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

Rushdie still lives under close police guard following Khomeini's 1989 call on Muslims to assassinate the writer for alleged blasphemy in his novel, The Satanic Verses.

Critics of European efforts to rehabilitate pariah states, such as Iran and Libya, in an attempt to encourage their moderate elements, regard such official visits as premature while those states remain hostile to the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and maintain links with terrorist organizations.

Jay Fiedler follows in Sid Luckman's footsteps

Jaguars' backup QB ends NFL regular season drought

By HARLAN ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO — Jacksonville Jaguars quarterback Jay Fiedler stands one game away from following in the footsteps of Hall of Fame quarterback Sid Luckman as quarterback in an NFL championship game.

Fiedler has already twice broken an NFL drought that stretches back to the 1940s during Luckman's glory days with the Chicago Bears.

When Fiedler led the Jaguars to a victory on Oct. 17 against the Cleveland Browns, he became the first Jewish quarterback since Luckman to be the "winning pitcher" in an NFL game. He followed that up with a winning performance against Cincinatti Bengals on the last day of the regular season.

Last week, the former Dartmouth star came off the bench in the second quarter of Jacksonville's 62-7 rout of cross-state rivals, Miami Dolphins.

With the AFC championship game looming this weekend, Fiedler is one win away from playing in an NFL championship game, albeit in a backup role behind starter Mark Brunell.

Hall of Famer Luckman, who died in 1998, led the Bears to NFL titles in 1940, '41, '43 and '46.

Coming off the bench with the game already well in hand in last weekend's playoff game, Fiedler completed seven of 11 passes for 172 yards and two TDs.

His first TD toss was a 70-yard bomb to wide receiver Jimmy Smith and moments later he followed that up with a 38-yarder to Alvis Whitted to put the Jags ahead 55-7.

Fiedler's winning ways began versus Cleveland when he came off the bench to relieve Brunell and lead the Jags to a 24-7 win. He followed that up with a final game win over Cincinnati by the same 24-7 margin, passing for 317 yards and becoming the first Jag quarterback other than Brunell to throw for more than 300 yards. In between, he got spot duty in a number of Jaguar victories.

A four-year backup in the NFL, with stops in Philadelphia, Minneapolis and Amsterdam in the NFL-Europe, Fiedler talked about his career in a recent telephone interview.

"If I could have any...gift I wanted, I'd ask John Elway, now that he's retired, to send some of his physical and mental abilities my way; he's the most gifted quarterback I've ever seen," Fielder said.

"I tried to model myself after him: a quarterback who can throw from the pocket but also can escape and run for a first down."

A football/basketball/track star at Oceanside (N.Y.) High School, Fiedler went on to study engineering science in college. He holds all Dartmouth's passing records and boasts a 21-7-1 record as a starter.

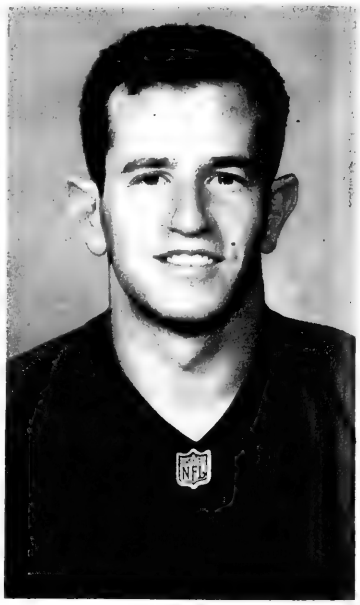
He was an undrafted free agent signee with the Philadelphia Eagles, and for two years was the third quarterback, not seeing any regular season game action in 1994 and '95. The next year he was waived by Philadelphia and then by Cincinnati.

In 1997, he played summer football for the Amsterdam Admirals, and that fall served as an assistant coach at Hofstra "to keep in shape and to stay in the game.

"I never gave myself a set time as to how long I'd pursue an NFL career, but if Minnesota hadn't picked me up last year..."

A competitor in the Maccabi Youth Games in basketball in Chicago in 1986, Fiedler said his European experience was "great culturally, because you had a lot of free time to travel around in different cities."

But "the football was a little frustrating because I was picked up after the season started and was alternating with another quarterback," he recalled.



Jay Fiedler

With the Vikings, he was number 3 on the depth chart behind Brad Johnson and Randall Cunningham.

After the season, "Jeff George looked solid for the number 2 spot [after Johnson was traded] and they were talking about using a high draft pick for another quarterback. So I looked for a place where I could compete for the number 2 spot, a more stable situation.

"I'm very satisfied with what I've done so far. Cleveland was the first time I was ever in a meaningful situation."

Fiedler finished the regular season with a plus 300-yard performance versus the Bengals.

His statistics at year end show he got into eight games, attempted 94 passes and completed 61 (64.9 percent) for 656 yards, two TDs and two interceptions.

The Jaguars finished the season on top of the AFC with a 14-2 record.

As for his NFL future, Fiedler says he's on a one-year contract with the Jaguars, and "when it runs out, I'll be an unrestricted free agent.

"I'd like to stay here, but I'd also like to look at the market" and see which other teams are less satisfied with their starting quarterbacks.

"It's Jacksonville's decision," he concluded.

הסיפור של נילי

FOR LESS

2 cups all purpose flour
1 cup brown sugar
1/2 cup white sugar
1/2 cup unsalted butter, room temperature
1/2 tsp salt
1 cup chopped chocolate-covered toffee bars (ie. Health Bars)
1 cup chopped pecans
1 tsp baking soda
1 cup buttermilk
1 large egg
1 tsp vanilla extract

Preheat oven to 350°F. Grease 13x9x2 inch glass baking dish. In food processor, beat first 5 ingredients in large bowl on low speed until mixture resembles coarse meal. Transfer 1/2 cup butter-sugar mixture to medium bowl; mix in toffee and pecans. Set aside. Stir baking soda into remaining butter-sugar mixture in large bowl. Add buttermilk, egg and vanilla, beating until combined. Transfer batter to prepared dish. Sprinkle toffee topping evenly over batter. Bake until topping is golden brown and toothpick inserted into centre comes out clean, about 35 minutes. Cool completely in baking dish. Cut into 16 squares. Store in airtight container at room temperature.

About Food

Dear Norene

By NORENE GILLETZ

January 2000 has arrived! One of the most popular resolutions is to lose weight. However, it's very difficult to follow a monotonous diet that deprives you of your favourite foods. That Y2K diet is sure to crash!

Instead, work on developing a new attitude. Go forward into the new millennium by focusing on positive lifestyle changes. You'll soon be on your "weigh" to a healthier, happier new you!

Try to base the majority of your meals on the Big Four – vegetables, fruits, grains and legumes (i.e., beans, peas, lentils). Include low-fat dairy products (skim or one percent milk, yogurt, low fat cheeses) – they contain calcium. Substitute soy milk fortified with calcium if you are lactose intolerant. Choose whole grain breads, cereals and grains (brown rice, bulgur, kasha). Eat fish, lean poultry and tofu instead of fatty beef. Enjoy vegetarian meals a few times a week.

Organize your grocery list according to categories: frozen foods, vegetables, fruits, dairy products, etc. It helps speed up shopping. Include convenient staples with a long shelf life (pastas, canned beans, salmon, tuna); you'll need to shop less often.

There is no such thing as the perfect, magical diet. Strive for variety. Go for green cuisine (broccoli, kale, spinach) – they're lean! Experiment with fresh herbs (basil, dill, thyme) – they add flavour without adding calories. Try preparing familiar foods slightly differently (e.g. replace ground beef with ground turkey in recipes).

This yummy recipe will help sneak more nutrition onto your plate. Enjoy!

PASTA VEGETABLE MEDLEY

16 oz pkg. spaghetti or rice noodles
3 cups broccoli, cut up (fresh or frozen)
1 tbsp olive oil
1 large onion, chopped
2 cups mushrooms, sliced
1 red and 1 green pepper, chopped
2 or 3 cloves garlic, crushed
2 tomatoes, chopped
Salt and pepper, to taste
2 tbsp fresh basil, chopped (or 1 tsp dried)
Grated parmesan cheese, optional

If using fresh broccoli, soak in salted water 15 minutes; drain well. In a covered casserole, microwave broccoli on High for 3 minutes. Meanwhile, bring a large pot of salted water to a boil. Cook pasta according to package directions.

In a non-stick large skillet or wok, heat oil. Saute onions, mushrooms, red pepper and garlic until golden, about 5 minutes. Add tomatoes and precooked broccoli; stir-fry 2 minutes longer. Season to taste. Drain pasta; top with vegetable mixture. Sprinkle with cheese. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Hezbollah searching for Arad

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BERLIN — Hezbollah guerrillas are searching for missing Israeli airman Ron Arad's remains with the help of German experts, the German magazine Der Spiegel reported last weekend.

Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the leader of Hezbollah, told the magazine that the search is concentrating on where Ron Arad, who was captured in Lebanon in 1986, might be buried.

Two weeks ago, Nasrallah had speculated that Arad might still be alive, saying the organization had no information indicating whether Arad was alive or dead.

Israeli security sources speculated that Hezbollah had apparently received no information on the missing airman in the past two weeks.

They termed Nasrallah's use of the words "buried" and "corpse" in his comments to Der Spiegel as "manipulation" and stressed that Israel believes Arad is still alive.

"We will probably have some clear findings soon," Nasrallah said.

Holocaust forum in Stockholm

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray is leading a 10-member Canadian delegation at a global forum on Holocaust education and remembrance taking place this week in Stockholm.

The International Forum on Holocaust Education, Research and Remembrance, from Jan. 26 to 28, has assembled experts from 46 countries for discussions, workshops and presentations on Holocaust pedagogy and commemoration.

In addition to the Canadian delegation, University of Toronto Holocaust historian Michael Marrus will be a panelist in a workshop entitled Holocaust Research: From the Archives to the Classroom.

Canadians joining Gray and two of his staff are Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen; Nate Leipciger, chair of CJC's Holocaust remembrance committee; Karen Mock, director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights; Rochelle Wilner, a B'nai Brith senior vice-president; Liberal MP Irwin Cotler; human rights lawyer David Matas; and Rosine Gerhard, an official with the Department of Canadian Heritage.

Herb Gray

Issues being examined include Holocaust school curricula; facing Holocaust denial; uses and misuses of the Internet; religious and ethical teachings relating to the Holocaust; the use of testimony in education; and the role of museums.

The forum is the third in a series that began in 1997 with the conference in London on looted Nazi gold, and the 1998 Washington conference on Holocaust-era assets. Several heads of state were expected to attend this week's gathering.

Gray told The CJN in a telephone interview that the conference grew out of a decision in 1998 by the Swedish, British and American governments to establish a task force on international co-operation on Holocaust education, remembrance and research.

Money for Venezuela

TORONTO — The Jewish community here has raised $5,000 for the victims of recent torrential rains, floods and mudslides in Venezuela. The funds were scheduled to be presented this week to Venezuelan consular officials by Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen.

ISRAEL

New Bank Governor

JERUSALEM — David Klein was sworn in as governor of the Bank of Israel last week, after his appointment was narrowly approved by the cabinet. Klein said the government's priority is to keep inflation at current low levels.

Dormant Bank Accounts

JERUSALEM — Israel's Bank Leumi has published, on its Web site, a list of close to 13,000 accounts that have not been accessed in more than 45 years. The move is aimed at locating the owners of the dormant accounts, or their heirs. The site is located at www.bankleumi.co.il.

Bulgarian Leader Visits

JERUSALEM — The president of Bulgaria arrived in Israel for a two-day visit last week that included meetings with top officials. Peter Stoyanov was also scheduled to attend a ceremony at which a square will be named in honour of Bulgaria, which defended its Jewish population from the Nazis.

Hanegbi to be Indicted

JERUSALEM — Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein said last week he will file a criminal indictment against former justice minister Tzachi Hanegbi. The charge relates to the period 1994 to 1996 when Hanegbi chaired the Knesset's finance committee. It is alleged he established and headed a non-profit foundation called Derekh Tzlacha. A police investigation revealed he had paid himself 288,000 shekels in salary and expenses out of contributions. Hanegbi already faces charges of fraud, falsification of corporate documents and breach of trust.

'Day of Judaism'

WARSAW — Poland's Roman Catholic Church marked its third annual "Day of Judaism" last week. As part of events designed to foster interfaith dialogue and education, Polish Jewish communal leaders joined Catholic priests and scholars at conferences and ceremonies in several major cities. On Jan. 27, Poland plans to sponsor a number of events to mark the 55th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz.

Mayor Declines Invite

BERLIN — Berlin's mayor said he would not attend a ceremony for a national Holocaust memorial here. Eberhard Diepgen has long opposed the planned memorial, but a spokesperson said he declined the invitation to the ceremony because of a scheduling conflict. Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder is slated to attend the Jan. 27 ceremony, which coincides with Germany's annual Day of Remembrance for Holocaust victims. Actual work on the monument is not expected to begin until the summer of 2001.

Surgery for Papon

PARIS — Convicted Nazi collaborator Maurice Papon returned to prison earlier this month after undergoing surgery to implant a heart pacemaker. Papon, 89, is serving a 10-year sentence for his role in the arrest and deportation of Jews from France during World War II. He has requested a presidential pardon on medical grounds.

Poland May Seek Nazi

WARSAW — Poland may demand the extradition from Syria of the last leading Nazi still believed to be at liberty. An official with Poland's justice ministry said he had been asked to assess whether Poland could seek the extradition of Alois Brunner to face trial for genocide. Brunner was private secretary to Adolf Eichmann.

Jews Worry Over Possible Changes to Law of Return

MOSCOW — Jewish citizens in the former Soviet Union are concerned about possible changes in the law guaranteeing Jews, their spouses, children and grandchildren automatic citizenship in Israel.

In Israel, proposals for a change in the Law of Return that could affect non-Jewish spouses and their offspring have been floated in recent months amid reports that more than half of all recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union are not Jewish, according to Jewish law.

"If we start changing the Law of Return, we will destroy emigration from the former Soviet Union," warned Leonid Dreyer, a university lecturer from Moscow.

A Russian Zionist organization launched at a December conference of the umbrella Va'ad Federation of Jewish Organizations and Communities of Russia, vigorously condemned attempts to modify the Law of Return, "which can cause serious problems to the process of repatriation of Russian Jews." The group also called on the Israeli government to maintain the status quo.

In November, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak told his cabinet he opposes any changes in the law.

MNAs return from Mideast goodwill mission

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Quebec parliamentary delegation believes it made a modest contribution to the cause of peace and democracy in the Middle East during its recent eight-day mission to the region.

The speaker of the national assembly, Jean-Pierre Charbonneau, the Parti Québécois member for Borduas, led the delegation, which met with political and academic leaders in Israel, the Palestinian Authority and Egypt.

Mount Royal MNA, Lawrence Bergman, who represented the Liberals, said he felt a great deal had been accomplished in terms of information exchange and goodwill.

"I also think we made our small effort for the peace process. As a third party willing to listen to all sides, we helped create some understanding when we travelled among our different hosts bringing with us the points of view we had heard," Bergman said. "Our hosts benefited from hearing about our experience with democracy and parliamentary institutions."

Others on the trip were André Boulerice, deputy government leader and PQ MNA for Ste. Marie-St. Jacques; Rita Dionne-Marsolais, PQ MNA for Rosemont; and Frédéric Fortin, a counsellor in the national assembly's interparliamentary relations department.

A personal goal of Charbonneau, who is first vice-president of the Assemblée parlementaire de la Francophonie, was to expedite Israel's membership in la Francophonie, the international association of countries where French is spoken.

As he noted, several of the Arab countries are already members and the inclusion of Israel could be another step toward reconciliation and a common ground of understanding in the Middle East.

As he said in a radio interview in Israel, Israel can legitimately claim a place within la Francophonie because one Israeli in six can speak French.

The main goal of the mission in Israel was to establish relations between the national assembly and the Knesset.

Bergman said "the first steps toward an agreement in principle" were reached on the creation of a Quebec section within the existing Canada-Israel Parliamentary Committee.

Bergman stressed that there was no discussion of Quebec independence during the mission, and that the intention from the outside was to act as parliamentary, rather than government representatives and to stick to a non-partisan line in discussions.

In fact, the delegation was feted at receptions given by Canadian ambassadors Michael Bell in Israel and Marie-Andrée Beauchemin in Egypt.

Bergman hopes to follow up the mission with an invitation to Knesset speaker Avraham Burg, to come to Quebec City in April for the first Yom Hashoah commemoration of its kind there.

In December, the national assembly unanimously adopted a private member's bill introduced by Bergman which officially recognizes Holocaust Day in the province.

The Quebec delegation met Burg at the Knesset. Bergman said Burg was interested in the legislation and accepted a copy of it. They also met with Yoram Ben-Ze'ev, associate director general for North American affairs of the foreign ministry.

The itinerary in Israel included visits to the grave of slain prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, Yad Vashem and the Supreme Court building.

They were hosted by MK Yuli Edelstein, deputy Speaker of the Knesset and Israeli president of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Committee, at a luncheon attended by parliamentarians. Among them was Colette Avital, a one-time Israeli consul in Montreal.

They attended a session of the Knesset, during which Burg recognized their presence in the visitors' gallery. Later, former Hebrew University president Hanoch Gutfreund hosted a dinner for them, sponsored by the Israeli Association for Canadian Studies.

The Quebecers visited the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and the Technion in Haifa. In Haifa, they also had talks with the deputy foreign affairs minister, Israeli Arab, Nawaf Massalha, and with Mayor Aman Mitzna.

Then they went to Beit Hagefen, a centre for Arab-Jewish co-operation. From there, they toured Tiberias and the Golan Heights.

In Ramallah, they met with Abu Alaa Ahmad Qu'rei, speaker of the Palestinian legislative assembly, and then visited Bethlehem.

The delegation travelled overland to Cairo from Jerusalem, a trip of about 10 hours.

Fans meet Canadiens legend Jean Béliveau

MONTREAL — More than 450 sports fans recently braved Montreal's first snowstorm to attend the annual Cote St. Luc Sports Celebrity Breakfast at the Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue.

There was good reason for the fans to fight the blowing snow: they had the opportunity to shake hands with Montreal Canadiens legend Jean Béliveau, who was seated at the head table.

The sold-out breakfast also was attended by three dozen amateur and professional sports personalities.

The breakfast, organized by CSL's assistant director of recreation, Harold Cammy, and by a slew of volunteers, included a raffle of sports memorabilia. The $40,000 raised will go to the Quebec Society for Disabled Children, a longtime cause close to Le Gros Bill's heart.

Béliveau has signed 500 lithographs of the portrait, which are being sold for $199 each. A portion of the proceeds will also go to the society.

Dear prime minister...

This column is an open letter, a plea to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien.

Canadians are showing signs of an increasing loss of confidence in our national "institutions." Conversely, we are also showing signs of an encroaching cynicism, harsh and cutting, in response to that eroding sense of confidence.

Whenever we find ourselves in the inevitable twists and turns of life's ordinary corners – family, education, health care, shelter – "plain folk" are bumping into a feeling that we cannot repair the things that need fixing.

That feeling is relatively recent, a confluence of domestic public policies, global trading phenomena and all-enveloping technological changes. When measured against the speeding-up pace of computerized, modern, electronic life, our individual lives seem to be not only reduced in size, but also reduced in value. And of course, we must resist that feeling.

The belief that invigorated the aspirations of previous generations – in the perfectibility of society, in the constant striving towards human betterment, in the pre-eminent importance of human ideals – is a little-held faith today.

And we are much diminished for it.

The seeming disappearance of the belief, especially among young Canadians, that we can improve conditions for our fellow human beings and that we must always at least strive to do so, is potentially very harmful for our society.

That is why I appeal to you.

As the head of the chief "institution" of our society – our federal government – you, more than anyone else, can start the process of restoring that belief.

Thinking about the future should not fill us or our children with a feeling of dread. Rather, it should fill us with a sense of excitement and even wonder at the many uncharted possibilities that the future may hold.

We are a mature society. No solutions to even the most difficult problems are beyond our ability to implement. But solutions to the problems that need fixing ought to be founded in the values that inspire belief in the ideals now being smothered by the cynicism that is ubiquitous. Foremost among those values is the paramountcy of human life.

One of the key problems that needs fixing is the health care system.

Evidence of the troubles of our health care system abounds in every region of the country. The newspapers and the airwaves contain horrible health-related stories each day.

By now, all Canadians are familiar with the system's shortfalls. There is a shortage of doctors. There is a shortage of nurses. There is a shortage of acute care beds. Waiting lists for certain cancer treatments stretch unacceptably and dangerously longer each day. In some places, provincial governments are actually paying for Canadians to receive their medical treatment in the United States.

The dysfunction in our health care system is the cumulative result of more than a decade of federal and provincial government policies, primarily, though not exclusively, policies of funding cutbacks.

We are feeling the effects of those policies today. And we will likely feel the effects in the future, as fewer and fewer young people are considering the healing professions for their career choices. And it is not for monetary reasons.

They have witnessed the conflict that infuses the health care system, the finger-pointing and the scapegoating. Why should they become part of that?

Last week in its editorial, this newspaper urged the prime minister and the provincial premiers to "immediately convene a health care summit to begin the process of mapping out a short-term and long-term rescue plan" for our country's health care system.

The background for the editorial was the by-now widely publicized tragic death in the Greater Toronto Area of 18-year-old Joshua Fleuelling.

Fleuelling died of cardiac arrest while in the throes of a severe asthma attack. The ambulance transporting him was turned away at the first hospital it reached. Eighteen more minutes elapsed until Fleuelling arrived at a hospital that would admit him. It is unknown whether those additional 18 minutes contributed to the young man's death. And there has been no decision yet by the coroner on whether to investigate the incident.

The Fleuelling tragedy was yet another incident in an increasingly long list of horrific health care-related incidents.

Later in the week, a homeless person in Montreal, denied access to medical treatment in a nearby hospital emergency department, died, frozen by the frigid winter air, in the arms of a passer-by.

Convening a health care summit would show Canadians that the government understands there is an urgency to the situation. It would thereby also demonstrate that it agrees with and adopts as its highest operating value, the saving of human lives. What a wonderful example that would be for all Canadians.

Les longs et éprouvants combats d'Abraham Serfaty

ELIAS LEVY
Reporter

MONTRÉAL – Après dix-sept ans de prison et huit années de bannissement en France, le plus célèbre opposant marocain, Abraham Serfaty, est rentré dans son pays natal le 30 septembre dernier, par la volonté du nouveau roi, Mohammed VI. La première vraie décision politique du jeune monarque alaouite. Le ministre de la Justice et des représentants de Mohammed VI l'ont accueilli avec beaucoup d'égards à son arrivée à Rabat.

Né en 1926 à Casablanca, ce Juif farouchement antisioniste fut condamné en 1977 à la détention perpétuelle pour "complot visant à renverser la monarchie" et "atteintes à la sûreté de l'État".

Ingénieur des Mines, militant de la première heure du Parti communiste marocain et membre fondateur du groupuscule marxiste clandestin Ilal Aman -En avant-, Abraham Serfaty sera écroué pendant quinze mois au Derb Moulay Cherif, le funeste centre de torture de Casablanca, et emprisonné pendant dix-sept ans à la prison de Kénitra.

Pour beaucoup de Marocains, Abraham Serfaty est aujourd'hui un des grands symboles de la longue et éprouvante lutte menée par le peuple marocain pour instaurer la justice et la démocratie.

Le Canadian Jewish News s'est entretenu récemment avec ce militant infatigable qui a toujours défendu contre vents et marées ses idées controversées.

Canadian Jewish News: Vous attendiez-vous à ce que Mohammed VI vous autorise, deux mois seulement après son intronisation, à retourner au Maroc?

Abraham Serfaty: Je ne m'y attendais pas. J'avais suivi de près ce que faisait le nouveau roi depuis son accession au trône. C'était très encourageant. Mais je ne m'attendais pas à ce qu'il prenne avec autant de rapidité et de détermination les décisions perspicaces qu'il a arrêtées quelques semaines seulement après son accession au trône, dont celle de m'autoriser à rentrer dans mon pays natal après plusieurs années d'exil.

C.J.N.: Ressentez-vous de l'amertume et des regrets lorsque vous pensez aux nombreuses années de prison, de bannissement et d'exil que vous avez vécues?

A.S.: Je veux voir vers l'avant. Je n'ai jamais éprouvé de la tristesse et de l'amertume sauf évidemment pour les sacrifices que ma famille a endurés. J'ai lutté dans un contexte difficile dont j'étais conscient et je me félicite d'avoir contribué par cette lutte à ce que les forces du progrès et de la démocratie au Maroc effectuent aujourd'hui des percées importantes.

Abraham Serfaty et son épouse Christine Daure.

C.J.N.: Le Maroc vit-il actuellement une révolution monarchique?

A.S.: Le terme révolution n'est pas le terme approprié. Il s'agit plutôt d'un projet de changement vers la démocratie qui est très net. Le Maroc est au début d'une nouvelle ère caractérisée par une marche vers le progrès et la démocratie. Au cours des dernières années de son règne, le roi Hassan II avait fait quelques réformes mais toujours limitées dans le cadre de ce qu'on appelait l'ancien système, le Makhzen -principal instrument de l'autorité monarchique, le Makhzen est surtout un mode de contrôle de la société fondé sur des réseaux d'allégeance et le clientélisme.

Mohammed VI a l'air résolu à dépasser le système du Makhzen pour aller, peut-être pas encore vers une démocratie à l'occidentale, c'est-à-dire où le roi règne mais ne gouverne pas, mais vers un équilibre plus réel entre un roi qui a des pouvoirs pas seulement politiques mais aussi spirituels, très imbriqués, et une avancée sérieuse de la démocratie. Trois facteurs fondamentaux caractérisent aujourd'hui la transition socio-politique en cours au Maroc: une forte poussée de la société civile, une relative carence de la classe politique et la volonté royale de mettre en branle des changements majeurs.

C.J.N.: Les tâches qui attendent Mohammed VI sont énormes. Néanmoins, l'accession au trône de ce jeune monarque semble avoir ravivé l'espoir et l'optimisme du peuple marocain. Partagez-vous cet espoir?

A.S.: Absolument. Le Maroc est confronté aujourd'hui à de très grands défis. Au cours des dernières décades, un fossé de misère dramatique s'est créé. Les tâches qui attendent Mohammed VI sont ardues et immenses: réduire le fossé des inégalités socio-économiques; établir la justice sociale; lutter contre l'analphabétisme; faire progresser le Maroc vers la démocratie… Des défis de taille. Mais, en même temps, le pays peut compter sur des atouts importants: la volonté du roi; sa maturité, qu'il a nettement démontrée à maintes reprises; la dynamique équipe qui l'entoure; la poussée de la société civile et le fait qu'il y a tout de même, malgré le déficit de la classe politique qui existe actuellement, des forces politiques, incarnées par l'actuel premier ministre socialiste, Abderrahman Youssoufi, qui sont des forces de progrès. Je pense que la conjonction de tous ces facteurs devrait permettre de résoudre ces problèmes à long terme. En effet, il ne faut pas s'attendre à ce que des problèmes d'une telle ampleur soient résolus du jour au lendemain. Je suis assez optimiste en ce qui a trait aux possibilités d'y parvenir.

C.J.N.: Êtes-vous parmi ceux qui réclament que les hauts responsables du régime de Hassan II soient jugés ou, au contraire, estimez-vous qu'il faut tourner définitivement la page de cette période sombre de l'Histoire du Maroc?

A.S.: Je ne suis ni pour l'une ni pour l'autre de ces deux solutions extrêmes. De nombreuses associations représentant des anciens prisonniers et des opposants politiques disparus demandent aujourd'hui des comptes. C'est normal et tout à fait légitime. Cependant, je pense qu'au niveau du nouveau roi et du pouvoir politique en général on n'est pas disposé à passer à une phase de règlements de comptes. J'avoue que je comprends assez bien cette position. Personnellement, je pense qu'il faut demander toute la vérité sur ce qui s'est passé mais pas forcément la justice. La justice est souvent revancharde. Dans certains cas, on ne connaît pas les limites de la vengeance. Par contre, je crois qu'il est nécessaire que toute la vérite sur ces années noires soit faite et que les hauts responsables de la police, qui par ailleurs ont été récemment limogés par Mohammed VI, soient traduits devant les tribunaux. Non pas pour les mettre en prison mais pour que la vérité éclate. Ces hauts dignitaires ont perpétré des exactions ignobles.

A.S.: Malheureusement, il ne reste plus beaucoup de Juifs au Maroc. Cependant, je pense qu'il est important de maintenir le noyau qui existe. La perpétuation de l'héritage historico-culturel du judaïsme marocain et le maintien de ce noyau est important pour les nouvelles générations qui vivent aujourd'hui en France, au Canada… et surtout en Israël. Ces Juifs marocains, qui sont aujourd'hui à la deuxième ou à la troisième génération, sont toujours attachés à leurs racines. Cela est très net.

Plusieurs personnalités juives marocaines, dont un des leaders de la gauche marocaine, Simon Lévy, qui s'occupe depuis quelques an-

'Approved of what we've done'

'Mr. Campaign' lauds new community campus his efforts helped build

MONTREAL — Gordon Brown, "Mr. Campaign" as he is so commonly referred to within the Montreal Jewish community, recently made his first visit to the new $30-million Montreal Jewish Community Campus.

One of FEDERATION CJA's two honorary presidents, Brown, 91, has committed much of his life to serving the Jewish community.

"To see Gordie's reaction... He absolutely approved of what we've done here," said Marilyn Blumer, president of FEDERATION CJA.

"I told him that we have a fifth floor [at Cummings House] now, and he said he hoped we'd have 20 someday," Blumer said. "We've built on what he started years ago when the organization moved here and closer to the community. Gordie was and continues to be an extraordinary community visionary."

As president of Allied Jewish Community Services from 1967 (today's FEDERATION CJA), Brown united 23 Jewish organizations to create a central community services organization. As chair of the 1961 Combined Jewish Appeal campaign, he set new records in fund-raising.

Brown's primary concern was always Jewish education. He believed the community was responsible for guaranteeing that those who could not afford a Jewish education would be helped.

He was also concerned about the older segment of the population and supported the creation of the Golden Age Association, Caldwell Residences, and Pollack and Harry Bronfman Square.

Brown and Maxwell Cummings ensured the funds necessary for the construction of these buildings.

Brown has been involved with just about every major capital funds campaign in Montreal since he first began fund-raising on behalf of the Jewish General Hospital in 1929.

He is a recipient of the Samuel Bronfman Medal, the highest honour bestowed upon members of the Montreal Jewish community. He was named Man of the Year by State of Israel Bonds in 1974.

Brown is a life trustee of FEDERATION CJA, a life vice-president of the Adath Israel Congregation, a governor of the Jewish General, an honorary director of the Hebrew Free Loan Association, a Gold Menorah member of B'nai Brith and an honorary fellow of Hebrew University. Three years ago, he was awarded the Order of Canada.

Queen Noor to support McGill U program

MONTREAL — Queen Noor, widow of the late King Hussein of Jordan, will be coming to Montreal in March to lend her support to a McGill University program that brings together Israelis, Palestinians and Jordanians for a year of study.

Her appearance will benefit the King Hussein Memorial Fellowship Fund established by McGill last October, of which she is international spokesperson.

The scholarship will help sponsor the fellows of the McGill Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building. Each year, 12 fellows come to McGill to study in the schools of social work or architecture.

After their year in Montreal, the fellows return to their respective lands to help establish projects that assist the disadvantaged in their societies.

They are known as "ambassadors of peace" because their ultimate goal is to expand exchanges between Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority, in areas of common interest related to the betterment of society.

American-born Queen Noor will attend three major events while here March 14:

- A private luncheon with 40 leading Montreal businesspeople who have made major donations to the fund. It will be hosted by the Desmarais family of Power Corp.
- A reception of 250 other donors, as well as federal and provincial politicians, in McGill's Strathcona music building. Queen Noor will address this gathering.
- A concert for 600 guests later that evening at the Pollack Concert Hall, featuring opera singer Julie Nesrallah and the McGill Jazz Ensemble. Queen Noor is scheduled to give a 30-minute speech at this event. Former McGill chancellor Gretta Chambers will be the MC.

Tickets for this event are $250, of which $225 is tax-deductible. Door prizes will include a trip courtesy of Royal Jordanian Airlines. Tickets are on sale through the McGill Middle East Program, 398-7162.

How hypnosis helped me say,
"So Long Size 16 ... Hello Size 8!"

Marnie before Hypnosis

My name is Marnie Fertal. I'm a full-time student. I lost 51 pounds in six short months. I kept my weight off for over 3 1/2 years. The story you are about to read is true and factual. It happened to me.

By Marnie Fertal

I lost 51 pounds without dieting. It was easy. My dress size plunged from a size 16 to a petite size 8 and it was effortless. If someone had told me this was possible five years ago, I wouldn't have believed them.

MORE RESULTS! ...

"Weight Leaves...FOR GOOD!"

"You learn to love yourself and the weight just leaves...FOR GOOD! I lost over 50 lbs.! I like myself again, which has strengthened my marriage and my self-confidence. I recommend hypnosis to everyone!"

Roseanne Greer, Administrative Assistant

"Saved My Life"

"It may sound a bit dramatic to say that hypnosis saved my life, but this is what I believe. After smoking for 25 years, I can now say I am a true non-smoker. Thank you for giving me my life back."

Linda Mandeville, Administrative Assistant

Skeptic to Believer!

"I was skeptical at first. I had tried to lose weight before. Nothing worked. With hypnosis I lost 45 pounds. Hypnosis made weight loss fun. If you are a skeptic like me, be open minded. Your free screening will speak for itself. For life-long weight loss success, choose hypnosis.

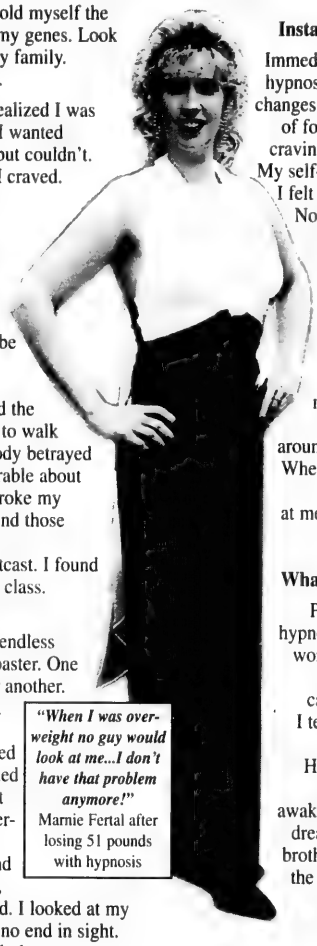
Out of Control

I was overweight my entire life. In my house junk food was everywhere. I told myself the weight was in my genes. Look at the rest of my family. They're fat too.

One day I realized I was out of control. I wanted to lose weight but couldn't. I felt helpless. I craved. I binged. I got depressed. The more I tried to diet the more I thought about food.

I wanted to be a model. Even took modeling classes. Learned the postures. How to walk and talk. My body betrayed me. I was miserable about my weight. It broke my heart to be around those skinny girls. I felt like an outcast. I found excuses to miss class. I dropped out.

I was on an endless dieting roller coaster. One stupid diet after another. Take a little off. Put more back on. I starved on shakes. Gained weight with diet pills. Pain, suffering, misery. I went out less and less. I sat home, lonely and afraid. I looked at my family and saw no end in sight. Being overweight hurt.



"When I was overweight no guy would look at me...I don't have that problem anymore!" Marnie Fertal after losing 51 pounds with hypnosis

Stop the Pain

My mother heard about hypnosis for weight loss from a friend. She said hypnosis made her weight loss easy. I gave them a call, went in, discussed my problem, signed up and lost 51 pounds. Hypnosis gave me back control. I know my weight loss is permanent. Keeping it off is effortless.

Instant Change

Immediately after my first hypnosis session I noticed changes. I stopped thinking of food all the time. My cravings totally vanished. My self-confidence soared. I felt gung-ho about life. No more cravings. No more binges. I was amazed when the hunger pangs vanished.

Now I am on the go all the time. I am getting A's in my college courses. I feel comfortable around everyone I meet. When I was overweight no guy would look at me...I don't have that problem anymore!

What a Discovery

People ask me what hypnosis is like. Does it work? Many folks tell me they think they can't be hypnotized. I tell them, YES! You can be hypnotized. Hypnosis is safe and natural. Like being awake during a pleasant dream. I joke with my brother that hypnosis is the lazy person's way to weight loss. It's relaxing and fun.

The Miracle

Don't think I'm an isolated case either. My Dad lost 33 pounds. My brother lost 65 pounds. Hypnosis was 100% responsible for our weight loss success. So there you have it. Three people, 149 pounds. It was easier than we thought possible.

Our results with hypnosis are a dream come true.

Dreams Came True

Hypnosis made my weight loss success possible. They gave me confidence, better health and a slim, attractive body. They helped my dad and brother too. That's why I believe hypnosis is the easiest way to lose weight and keep it off. It cost much less than expensive diet programs and I didn't have to fuss with weighing, measuring or counting. What a relief to know I will never have to diet again.

Free Screening

I recommend hypnosis without reservation. It worked for me and I'm convinced it can work for anyone who wants lasting weight loss. You can find out how hypnosis can benefit you and it won't cost one red cent. Pick up the phone and call right now. Schedule your free hypnotic screening. It's fun and informative. Unwise rabbis

Last week, Jerome Segal, a research scholar at the Centre of International and Security Studies at the University of Maryland, invited some 1,200 Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist rabbis in the United States to sign a statement calling on Israel and the Palestinians to "share" Jerusalem. Approximately three-quarters of the rabbis approached by Segal refused to sign the document. But 300 rabbis did sign Segal's petition.

The release of the document served as a publicity generating welcome mat for the visit to Washington last week by Yasser Arafat, on which he stepped, undoubtedly, with unabated glee.

"The question," the rabbis ordained, "is whether Jerusalem should be under the sovereignty of one nation...whether the pursuit of both justice and peace requires that...Jerusalem should be shared with the Palestinian people. We believe that it does." There was neither ambiguity nor humility in the text; nor indeed was there any wisdom.

For a number of reasons, the welcoming "mat" so hospitably and carefully spread at the feet of the visiting Arafat by the signatory rabbis, was quite unwelcome. The rabbis' initiative was:

• Obstructive. Rather than pave the way for agreement on the "issue" of Jerusalem, the statement actually obstructs and interferes with the delicate, multi-layered and deeply complicated bargaining process between the two sides.

• Sanctimonious. The substance and tone of the actual language in the petition – offering advice on what constitutes both justice and peace in the situation – are smug, supercilious and even condescending to the Israeli negotiators.

• Unrepresentative. The signatories signed the statement in their capacities as rabbis to lend a kind of rabbinic hechsher or seal of religious legitimacy to their personal political views. But their views are flagrantly unrepresentative of the mainstream within their own respective branches of Judaism, as witnessed by the refusal of an overwhelming majority of their rabbinic colleagues to sign the petition, not to mention, of course, the absence of Orthodox signatures on the document. Furthermore, there is no suggestion that the rabbis consulted, let alone signed on behalf of their congregations. In a sense, therefore, their statement is more than unrepresentative, it is misrepresentative.

• Divisive. Even though the signatories constitute a minority within their streams, the impression might be created and exploited in Israel, indeed around the Jewish world, that the petition was somehow "authoritative." If believed by the religious establishment and by most Israelis, the many recent painstaking and thoughtful efforts aimed at bringing the streams closer together may be jeopardized.

• Hypocritical. The non-Orthodox religious streams and a significant number, too, of the Orthodox world in North America have rightly lamented the co-mingling of religion and politics in Israeli life. But by signing such a petition, trading on their credit as rabbis, the 300 signatories have embraced the very behaviour they vehemently condemn in Israel, namely, injecting their personal "rabbinic" (read religious) views on Jerusalem into the highly charged, emotional political arena of Middle East peace negotiations. Perhaps the rabbis were being naive; for certain, they were ill-advised.

Re: Sheldon Kirshner's subjective list of the 100 greatest Jews of the millennium (CJN, Jan. 6 and 13). I wish to point out that one who reads his articles could have the impression that only a Jewish man can be great. There is not one woman listed in the 100 "great Jews of the millennium." There are a couple of token women listed at the very end in the runners-up.

Has Kirshner never heard of Golda Meir, Bella Abzug, Hannah Senesh, Anne Frank or Gertrude Stein? It is outrageous to see a list of 100 Jewish names and not see the name of at least one woman.

Kirshner must check his facts and open his world view to include all Jews, not just the men.

Approves Israeli torture ruling

This is in response to Bruce Elman's article, "Israel Basic Laws are Not Suicide Pact" (CJN, Jan. 13), in which Elman criticizes the Israeli Supreme Court for its September ruling banning the use of torture.

Elman contends that the ruling unduly jeopardizes Israeli lives, thereby rendering the Basic Laws meaningless by "sanctifying only the rights of the dead." Having volunteered for the Public Committee Against Torture in Israel, the grassroots Israeli NGO that put forth several of the petitions that led to this landmark ruling, I would like to point out some crucial facts that Elman neglected to take into consideration.

To begin with, the General Security Services' (GSS) contention that it merely tortured "ticking bombs" who were likely to perpetrate violent acts against Israeli civilians is simply not true. A glance at the records of their interrogation schedules indicates that in numerous cases, torture became a routine practice employed by the GSS weekly from nine to five, Sunday through Thursday (the Israeli workweek).

Moreover, hundreds of innocent Palestinians were detained, tortured and released without charge or trial. Many of them suffered irreparable physical and psychological damage and had difficulty reintegrating into their respective communities. Ten Palestinians have died during interrogation.

Finally, an absolute prohibition on torture exists under any and all circumstances for a reason. "Ticking bombs" do not justify such cruelty. Thus, it was no more justified for the Syrians to torture captured Israeli pilots who clearly posed an existential threat to their country than it is for Israelis to torture Palestinians. Until the ruling, Israel was the only country in the world to legally sanction torture.

No need for Jews to beg

Re: Rabbi Gunther Plaut's column "Wake up, Ontario!" (CJN, Jan. 6). Kol hakavod to Rabbi Plaut for speaking out so eloquently on the issue of discrimination in the funding of Ontario's school system. Parents in the Jewish and non-Jewish communities have been saying for years that the funding of Catholic religious education to the exclusion of all other religions is unfair and unjust.

Unfortunately, the column offers a suggestion that would not fulfil the ruling of the United Nations human rights committee. The committee ruled that the Waldmans must be treated equally with Catholics. According to the column, the Waldmans are calling for the same funding rights to be given to non-Catholics as those given to Catholics. For the writer to suggest (even as a first step) the less-than-quarter-measure of funding issues of public health in non-Catholic religious schools is completely at odds with the issue of equality, and undermines the effect of the UN ruling.

The Jewish community need not beg to end the discrimination; the Jewish community must demand an end to the unfairness.

Condemn Iran for attack

Your editorial condemning the poisonous rhetoric by Iranian officials must be acted upon by the Canadian government. I call upon the Canadian ambassador to the United Nations to present a resolution condemning Iran for its outrageous verbal attack on a member state of the United Nations. Since Canada will likely be participating in any peacekeeping force, following peace between Israel and Syria, the control of such belligerent comments is important not only for the safeguard of Israelis but also for Canadian peacekeepers.

Internet trips up Irving

The libel case currently being heard in the English courts of David Irving vs. Deborah Lipstadt and Penguin Books promises to have repercussions far beyond the question of Irving's integrity as a right-wing historical writer (CJN, Jan. 20). If the judge finds in favour of the defendants, at the very least, Nazi sympathizers and Holocaust deniers will receive a serious setback in their ongoing malevolent campaigns.

It has been reported that both parties have spent two years collecting evidence in preparation for the case. We are in the Internet age, and my research indicates that there is sufficient "original" information on the Web for most of us to form a pretty well-informed view of what actually happened in those dark, desperate days, without having to rely on Irving.

Holocaust denial comes back into vogue

By ELIAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The following is surely one of the most bizarre events of the modern era.

Although World War II ended 55 years ago, although thousands of memoirs and research studies have described the atrocities committed during that period and although museums from Washington to Jerusalem have documented those atrocities, one of the most important trials pertaining to the denial of the Holocaust opened last week in London.

What is particularly bizarre is that, in this courtroom drama, the tables seem to have been turned. The plaintiff is a known denier of the Holocaust while the defendant is a historian who has written a book that has blown the plaintiff's argument to pieces.

Author and historian David Irving has filed a libel suit against Deborah Lipstadt and against Penguin Books, which published Lipstadt's book, Denying the Holocaust: The growing assault on truth and history.

In his books and lectures, Irving claims that the reports of gas chambers and of the extermination of six million Jews are false. Lipstadt has refuted his arguments. He is now suing her, accusing her of causing "irreversible damage" to his name and professional standing.

At the opening of the trial, Irving declared that he does not deny the Holocaust: "No person in full command of his mental faculties, and with even the slightest understanding of what happened in World War II, can deny that the tragedy actually happened, however much we dissident historians may wish to quibble about the means, the scale, the dates and other minutiae."

Irving repeated his claim that the mass murder of Jews in eastern Europe was carried out without Hitler's knowledge.

He allows for the possibility that the S.S. conducted killing experiments in which gas was used; however, according to Irving, a massacre of the proportions of the Holocaust is simply not logistically possible.

When asked by the judge whether, in his opinion, six million Jews had been annihilated by the Nazis, Irving replied: "If I was a Jew, I would be far more concerned not at who pulled the trigger but why. Anti-Semitism is a recurring malaise in society. There must be some reason why anti-Semitic groups break out like some kind of epidemic."

The judge queried whether Irving agreed with the statement that the Germans had murdered millions of human beings, whereupon Irving answered: "I hesitate to speculate. It was certainly more than one million, certainly less than four million."

As Irving sees the situation, he himself is a victim of a world Jewish conspiracy. He claims that, ever since Lipstadt published her book, publishers are afraid to publish his works and bookstores are similarly afraid to sell them.

Denial of the Holocaust is not new. In fact, it began almost on the day the Allies liberated the last of the camps and before the crematoriums had cooled off.

As early as 1948, Paul Rassinier published La ligne de la passage, a book that denied the Holocaust and that was purportedly based on his own experiences as a concentration camp inmate.

In 1965, an American professor, Austin App, came out with his book, The Six Million Swindle, in which he argued that the Germans had never drawn up blueprints for exterminating the Jews of Europe.

In 1973, a former German army officer, Theis Christopherson, published The Lie of Auschwitz, in which he tried to prove that the number of Jews murdered by the Germans was actually less than 200,000.

Since the mid-1970s, hundreds of books and articles spouting this same kind of argument have appeared. Most of them have been authored by extreme right-wingers.

The Irving affair is different and far more important than all these other episodes, because of his writing skills and his supposed expertise in the historical field. He also can locate documents whose contents he can twist to suit his particular ideological tendencies.

Trials have taken place in the past on the subject of Holocaust denial, but in those cases the litigation was initiated against Holocaust deniers, in countries where Holocaust denial is considered a criminal offense.

This time, however, the Holocaust denier is the plaintiff who must therefore provide the burden of proof.

Although the formal cause of the litigation now taking place is the plaintiff's demand for compensation for damages, it is obvious that the central issue – which gives the trial its historical significance – is the judicial clarification of whether the Holocaust took place and whether six million European Jews were exterminated by the Nazis and their collaborators.

Irving, who has written 30 history books, acquired a certain reputation at the start of his professional career, although his more recent work does not meet the standards of historical research. He has become lionized by neo-Nazis and other anti-Semites.

It is, of course, no mere coincidence that Holocaust denial goes hand-in-hand with racism and anti-Semitism.

"Holocaust denial," states a background paper issued by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai Brith, "is a contemporary form of the classic anti-Semitic doctrine of the evil, manipulative and threatening world Jewish conspiracy."

The background paper also notes: ' Holocaust denial...has emerged as an important 'cutting edge' ideological cement of the diverse hate movements in the 1990s...as a powerful conspiracy theory uniting otherwise disparate fringe groups (e.g., Liberty Lobby, various [Ku Klux] Klan factions, neo-Nazis ... racist skinheads, etc.)."

In his lectures, Irving sounds less cautious than the statements he is now making in the courtroom.

Speaking before an audience in Calgary, for example, he came out with the following utterance: "I don't see any reason to be tasteful about Auschwitz. It is baloney. It is a legend.

"I say quite tastelessly, in fact, that more women died in the backseat of Edward Kennedy's car at Chappaquiddick than ever died in a gas chamber in Auschwitz."

Lipstadt's book appeared in the United States in 1993 and thus it seems natural to ask why it took Irving six years to sue.

The answer is complex, apparently, for several reasons.

Historical revisionism is all the rage, after all, and perhaps Irving believes that the trend could serve his best interests when he argues, in his defence, that he and other historians have the basic right to look at events from a perspective that differs from what is accepted.

Perhaps he is hoping that today, as Jewish organizations present restitution claims in the billions of dollars on behalf of the Holocaust victims, the arguments of Holocaust deniers will sound sweeter to the ears of many listeners.

It is also possible that Irving thinks that, with the majority of Holocaust survivors in their graves or suffering from weak memories, the defence will be hard put to find reliable witnesses to counter his claims.

It is impossible to say whether the trials being conducted today against Bosnian or Rwandan war criminals will prevent crimes against humanity in the future.

What is clear, however, is that if the London court hearing the Irving-Lipstadt trial makes peace with Holocaust denial, the deterrent effect of these current trials for war crimes will be significantly diminished.

A strange tale of contradictions

Some months ago, I had an interesting and, in fact, unusual visitor. Manfred Wolf, a Yekke like myself, and a resident of Toronto, brought a photo album that contained not only pictures, but also original documents.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Together they formed a remarkable testimony of the kind that I had never encountered in the many written records of the Nazi era that I have seen.

Wolf gave me some notes which contained the following information: In the year 1935, all German men born between 1914 and 1915 were called to have medical examinations, which were to take place in his hometown.

Those were the days when Hitler had started to expand his army at a rapid pace, foreshadowing his later violent intrusions into the life of Europe and the world.

Jews, of course, were excluded from the German army as they were from all government positions and many professions like law. But, in Wolf's case, the unusual happened: he and another Jewish boy were among a group of young men who were called to report. He had no choice but to present himself before the authorities.

The examinations having been completed, the applicants were sent home where they were to receive further instructions. But young Wolf never heard another word. Obviously, they had noticed he was a Jew and that was the end of the matter – or at least so he thought.

On Kristallnacht, three years later, Wolf and his dad were arrested and sent to the Sachsenhausen concentration camp. Some weeks later, father and son were informed that if they could produce emigration papers to some country, they would be released. The Wolfs had managed to obtain permission to go to Bolivia and, indeed, they were set free and given 30 days to leave the country.

Now comes the strange tale that has probably never been duplicated: Manfred Wolf's papers were in order, or so he thought. But then, he received another visit from the dreaded Gestapo. He was sure they had come to arrest him again.

In this case, it turned out to be otherwise. The Gestapo official informed Wolf that he was still a member of the German army and that, unless he could be released, he could not receive the necessary certification that would allow him to leave the country.

Wolf immediately contacted the army to get a piece of paper testifying to his discharge. To his surprise and bitter dismay, the army informed him that no such discharge papers would be issued.

So Wolf betook himself to the Gestapo – something no Jews in their right mind would do voluntarily. He had no choice, he felt, and he told them he could not obtain a release from the army, even though as a Jew he could not serve. Only the Gestapo, he said, would be able to get the papers. Surprisingly, they listened to him and obtained them. In due time, Wolf was able to emigrate.

The Gestapo is thus on record as having helped a Jew, a strange tale indeed. But then, the Nazi era was full of contradictions that historians to this very day are trying to sort out.

A debate over norms and principles

The '90s were the decade in which the imperative of security started to lose its impact as the ultimate argument in Israeli life. As the new century dawns, the results of this change will continue to have a far-reaching impact on public attitudes toward a host of domestic and external issues.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

While the two issues occupying Israelis these days seem dramatically different, they have more in common than meets the eye. On the external front, the public debate is focused on the negotiations with Syria. On the domestic front, the issue is the "Weizman scandal." Both are important elements in a reshaping of norms and principles as Israel looks to the future.

Recent public opinion polls show approximately 50 percent of Israelis support the peace treaty with Syria, based on public reports to date. Over 60 percent acknowledge that a deal with Syria will require significant territorial adjustments. At the same time, only about a third of Israelis believe that Syria is interested in "real peace" with Israel. In other words, there is greater support for the process than there is trust in the Syrians, even before the terms of the deal are known. This is no different from the consistent findings with regard to the Palestinians, where support for the negotiations outweighs trust of Arafat.

In other words, Israelis are ready to make peace at a significant cost, even with adversaries they do not trust. Opponents of the Syria deal know this. The opposition to the agreement wants to force Barak to take a hard line because of domestic pressure, in the hope that this will make it impossible to reach an agreement.

The rallies and attendant public campaign can focus on one issue only – the values of Zionism and settlement of the land. Any other arguments put forward by the Likud fly in the face of former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu's willingness to sign virtually the same deal with Hafez al-Assad. Therefore, what might have been a debate over the relevant – and as yet unclear – security provisions in the agreement (that itself is far from completion), is becoming a debate over values and principles.

The question will be whether in Israel today, Zionism is about holding on to settlements and the Golan at all costs, or about making painful, pragmatic sacrifices for the sake of a new regional reality. All sides know that the result will be not a warm peace, but rather something approaching non-belligerency, cold diplomatic relations and an end to Israel's controversial and costly presence in southern Lebanon. Just as in the case of the West Bank, support for the agreement is primarily the result of a sober and calculated – rather than ideological – assessment of the better terms for Israel's future in the region.

The debate over the circumstances surrounding allegedly unreported payments of several hundred thousands of dollars from Edouard Sarousi to President Ezer Weizman in the late '80s and early '90s has dominated the Israeli press for weeks. Weizman's weak defence and early indifference to the allegations are not only true to character for the "shoot from the hip" general, but also a reflection of the older, normative world in which his public career developed.

It reminds many Israelis of the story of then chief of staff Moshe Dayan, who stopped at an orange grove to pick oranges. The guard stopped him, and when he recognized Dayan, apologized and said, "Sorry, I thought you were just a regular thief."

Israel has come a long way since the early days of the frontier mentality that had different rules for different positions. And while the controversial decision by the attorney general to investigate the story further is debated, most Israelis feel that Weizman's reaction was indicative of the old ways rather than the norms that exist today.

For all his bluntness, Weizman is one of the last of Israel's founding generation. He had a critical role in developing the air force that won Israel's air battles, and he, along with Dayan, had the greatest influence on Menachem Begin's decision to sign the Camp David accords. As such, he joins the ranks of great soldiers and peacemakers in Israel's history. The very controversy is a sad ending to an illustrious, if colourful career.

Weizman the public servant has come up against norms that may have seemed unimportant or irrelevant to Weizman the man. Even if the (likely) conclusion is that there are no grounds for a criminal investigation, the damage to him has been done.

The Jewish polity: Then and now

Some weeks ago the Jewish world suffered the tragic death of Daniel J. Elazar, one of the foremost scholars of modern Jewish studies in this century. Elazar was a professor of political science at both Bar-Ilan University in Israel and Temple University in Pennsylvania, and was the founder of the Jerusalem Centre for Public Affairs, a Jewish policy think tank.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Elazar was a leading authority on the political aspects of Jewish communal life. He had a close relationship with Canadian Jewry, and he co-authored a definitive study of the Canadian Jewish polity with Prof. Harold Waller of McGill University.

Elazar created the field of Jewish political studies, and argued that there was an unbroken Jewish political tradition rooted in the concept of a covenant between God and Israel and between leaders and the people.

Elazar also claimed that the tools and concepts of political science could be used to study the political life of Jewish communal institutions – the Jewish polity. We could ask questions of Jewish political leaders that one also asks of any country: How are political-communal decisions made? Whose interests are taken into account by Jewish leaders? How democratic is the Jewish polity?

These questions have been particularly acute for Jewish communal leaders in the past century, given the shadow of the Holocaust. There is no escaping the fact that the years 1933 to 1945, and even earlier, were not glorious ones for Jewish communal leadership, both in Europe and in North America.

The litany of charges is familiar. German Jewish leaders were not aggressive enough in fighting the rising anti-Semitism and Nazi influence before Hitler took power in 1933. And during the war itself, Jewish leaders in the Jewish Councils in various ghettos were too compliant in the face of Nazi wishes, almost to the point of complicity. Why did they not organize more militant resistance?

And Jewish leaders in North America were also too meek. Why did they not take more militant action to force Canada and the United States to take in more German Jewish refugees after 1933? And why did they not move more aggressively to convince the Allies to bomb Auschwitz or railway tracks towards the end of the war?

While it is legitimate to pose these questions and try to answer them, they all suffer from a misplaced context. They combine the cheap wisdom of hindsight with the facile confounding of the present day sense of Jewish security with the far different sensibilities of the 1920s and 1930s.

Few leaders could fathom that Germany would engineer unspeakable horrors.

There is also an assumption that Jewish leaders in the ghettos had a wide array of options. They did not. Conceptions of human rights and minority rights were weakly developed.

Even if they enjoyed formal civic equality, Jewish leaders in prewar Europe and North America operated in a heavily anti-Semitic social milieu. Prejudice and discrimination were everywhere. They did not want to risk losing newly made gains. Actually a sober review of the record of the period reveals that these leaders tried repeatedly and valiantly, but not militantly, to defend Jewish interests. They were not successful.

Plus ça change.. The echoes of the Holocaust continue. In France at present, there is an effort to hold the national railroad accountable for collaboration with the Nazis in the deportation through their trains of French Jews to death camps.

But opposing this effort is none other than CRIF, the official agency of the organized French Jewish community. CRIF believes the anger is best directed at the German authorities. This flap takes place against the backdrop of the reigning myth of universal French resistance against the Nazis, when in fact the level of complicity was significant.

But something has changed. No longer can anyone accuse the entire "established" Jewish communal leadership of meekness in the defence of Jewish interests.

While CRIF may be staking out a conciliatory position, it is opposed by the militant World Jewish Congress (WJC), which has been the major mover in seeking restitution from German and other European banks, insurance companies, and corporations for confiscated Jewish assets and for slave labour. Edgar Bronfman of the WJC is both an establishment leader, and a militant.

Of course, CRIF has a more immediate responsibility for the welfare of French Jewry than does the WJC. I would argue that a dual approach of both militancy and quiet diplomacy may be best in such cases. Jewish communal leadership in Canada mercifully is not faced with comparable dilemmas.

The Kirshner File

A reporter looks back at 25 years

I marked my silver anniversary at The Canadian Jewish News recently, and in this column, I continue my reminiscences.

In the spring of 1982, several months before my second daughter, Lauren, was born, I found myself in the company of Aaron Jeifetz, a rugged Jewish gaucho (cowboy), in a remote corner of Argentina's pampas. I was in Argentina to write about the largest Jewish community in Latin America. By happenstance, I left Buenos Aires, an elegant city, a day before the war in the Falklands broke out. I read about it as I lounged on a beach in Rio de Janeiro.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Later that year, I visited Sosua, a charming Jewish colony in the Dominican Republic established by German refugees. In Toronto, I interviewed Chaim Herzog, a former director of Israeli military intelligence – and future president of Israel – who observed that Israel's occupation of West Beirut, a dimension of its ill-fated invasion of Lebanon, had been a major mistake.

In 1983, I covered the 40th anniversary of the Warsaw ghetto uprising, a moving event which Poland regarded as a bridge to better relations with Jews in the Diaspora and Israel. My one and only trip to southern Lebanon, organized by the Israeli army for reporters, occurred that summer. Wearing a flak jacket, I joined a tour that included a peek into Nabatiya, now a Hezbollah stronghold.

I plumbed the depths of apartheid and explored the Jewish community's relationship with that discredited segregationist system in 1984 when I visited South Africa.

Then I wrote about the Jews of Greece (struggling to rebuild after the deprivations of the Nazi occupation) and of Denmark (trying to resist the tide of assimilation in a country whose Jewish population had been saved from certain destruction).

I arrived in Germany just as the 1985 Bitburg affair subsided. In Darmstadt, the municipality was building a synagogue to replace one that had been destroyed by the Nazis. In Schopfloch, a sleepy town in Franconia, I discovered a dialect called Lachoudish, a peculiar blend of German, Yiddish and Hebrew.

My plane touched down in Vienna in 1986 as the Waldheim affair flared. I talked with Simon Wiesenthal, the wizened Nazi hunter, and cycled down a tranquil country road one Sunday morning to the Mauthausen concentration camp.

In a complete change, I spent two weeks in Costa Rica, studying the prosperous, well-integrated Jewish community and enjoying the incredible physical beauty of this politically stable Central America republic.

There were travel stories to write in 1987. In Switzerland, I was enthralled by snow-clad mountain peaks and sylvan valleys, while in Jamaica, I was struck by lush tropical vistas and Noel Coward's enchanting Firefly estate. Toward the close of the year, in Israel, I gathered material for a 40th-year anniversary supplement the paper published in 1988. As I left Tel Aviv, the intifadah erupted, a topic which continually engaged my attention for the next few years.

One glorious summer morning in 1988, in the company of a native guide, I fished for pickerel on a placid lake in northern Ontario near Minaki Lodge. Thanks to beginner's luck, I hauled in a handsome specimen. It not only provided grist for a story, but the raw material for my mother's delicious gefilte fish. Throughout that year, I wrote analyses about Israel's warming relations with the Soviet Union and the Soviet bloc and the Iran-Iraq War, then winding down.

From my point of view, 1989 was an auspicious year. I revisited Switzerland, renewing my acquaintanceship with its Jewish community. I returned to West Germany and interviewed Manfred Rommel, mayor of Stuttgart and son of the legendary German general, and Heinz Galinski, the severe and notoriously cranky chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany. In a memorable day trip to East Berlin, I witnessed East Germany's last gasp.

Rabbi Moses Rosen and Kirshner.

Back in Toronto, I interviewed Marek Edelman, the sole surviving commander of the Warsaw ghetto rebellion, and Yitzhak Rabin, Israel's defence minister. Edelman was a difficult person. The extremely reserved Rabin told me he had no objection to an indirect PLO role in peace talks.

In 1990, I interviewed Richard von Weizsäcker, president of Germany, and Bassam Abu Sharif, Yasser Arafat's aide, who called for a two-state solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Bermuda, that lovely isle, beckoned, and for five days I explored its nooks and crannies by motorbike.

The crisis triggered by Iraq's invasion of Kuwait consumed me in 1991. But there was a pleasant diversion in Singapore and Thailand – which introduced me to southeast Asia – and an intriguing visit to Romania. In Bucharest, I interviewed Rabbi Moses Rosen, a voluble figure of legend and intrigue. And in rural Transylvania, I was taken on a tour of the late Nicolae Ceausescu's luxury chalet. I couldn't resist bouncing up and down on his outsize bed.

Nineteen-ninety-two was the year I visited Jewish communities in Latvia, Lithuania and Ukraine. Jews there were torn by the need to rebuild and by the desire to emigrate. In newly independent Ukraine, I made a point of visiting Shalom Aleichem's birthplace in Pereyaslav-Khmelnitsky.

Fresh from Ukraine, I flew to Halifax. I wrote a piece about Pier 21, where my parents and I, newly arrived immigrants, had disembarked in 1948. Then it was on to Thunder Bay for a look at a declining small-town Ontario Jewish community.

I went back to Israel in 1993, visiting the West Bank settlement of Ariel (whose residents were troubled by the ascendancy of a Labour government), and speaking to one of the leaders of the Islamic Movement, Sheik Abdallah Darwish (who professed loyalty to the Jewish state).

And I spent three weeks in Russia and Belarus, amazed at the revival of Jewish life there. By sheer coincidence, I was in Moscow when tanks brutally crushed a Communist insurrection. As I would learn, my story never got through because the fax machine in Toronto had been turned off! So much for technology.

In the spring of 1994, I spoke to Rolf Pauls, Germany's first ambassador to Israel; interviewed Ignatz Bubis, the Jewish community leader who clipped his fingernails as he talked; investigated the upsurge of neo-Nazism; and visited the Eagle's Nest, Hitler's hideaway in the Bavarian Alps. And in Austria, I went to Braunau, where he was born. In the Gaza Strip, I joined an American Jewish delegation which met with Yasser Arafat. He promised to crack down on terrorism. On the Golan Heights, I interviewed Jewish settlers who expressed anxiety about the future.

The highlights of 1995 included an exclusive interview with Austrian Chancellor Franz Vranitzky, who announced a restitution fund for Holocaust survivors; an encounter with the illustrious Russian poet Yevgeny Yevtushenko, who recalled the genesis of his poem Babi Yar; and a meeting with Faisal al-Husseini, a sombre Palestinian official who predicted that a Palestinian state would be formed by 2000.

In 1996, I interviewed Ehud Barak, an amiable but evasive man who promised to move the Labour party to the centre; visited cities in eastern Germany; and dropped into Bad Reichenhall– my birthplace in the lee of the Alps – in a sentimental journey.

The following year, I wrote about the burgeoning Swiss banking scandal after spending 10 days in Switzerland. In 1998, I began writing Academia, a new column about Jewish academics. Last year, I visited Israel, Egypt and Croatia, and once again covered the Toronto film festival, a marvellous cultural event.

Twenty-five years on, it has been quite an eventful ride.

Info on the Golan available

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The on-again off-again talks between Israel and Syria illustrate how difficult it is to decide the future of the Golan Heights. As Israel continues its negotiations with Syria over the strategic plateau, there are many Web sites you can visit to check out the history, the latest news and the points of view in both Israel and Syria.

One of the best places to start is Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs Web site [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH00so0]. From the 1974 Separation of Forces Agreement through the present, you get a play-by-play of the major contacts between Syria and the Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres, Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak governments.

There's also a link to a detailed article from Middle East Insight magazine that traces the border following the Anglo-French partition of Ottoman Syria through to the eve of the Six Day War [http://www.mideastinsight.org/9_99/lineofjune67_9.99.html]. One of the fascinating parts of the article explains how, prior to the 1967 war, Israel ruled all of Lake Tiberias, yet along the northeastern shore, control was limited to a 10-metre strip of beach.

After the Yom Kippur war, Israel and Syria signed a Separation of Forces on May 31, 1974. You can read that document at [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH00pw0] and see how the borders were again modified.

What about the present? Things change so quickly in the Middle East that it's hard to keep track. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs maintains a page that links to the latest events [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH0gai0]. When I last looked, there were recent articles from Ha'aretz's English edition, the Jerusalem Post, CNN and the U.S. State Department Web site.

You can also search for the latest reports about the Golan from Reuters and AP at Yahoo [http://search.news.yahoo.com/search/news?p=Golan+Heights].

The largest Jewish community in the Golan is Qatzrin [http://www.golan.org.il/qatzrin/]. The capital of the Golan was founded in 1977 and now has some 6,000 inhabitants. Their bilingual Web site traces the history of the area and highlights some of the major tourist attractions and businesses. One of the most famous is the Ramat Hagolan Winery [http://www.golanwines.co.il/] makers of award-winning wines, marketed under the labels Yarden, Gamla and Golan.

The most prominent Web site in the Golan itself can be found at [http://www.golan.org.il/] in Hebrew with its English counterpart at [http://www.golan.org.il/eindex.htm]. This large site combines history, tourism, politics and lobbying on behalf of having the Golan remain within Israel.

Finally, I highly recommend a series of articles written by Ellis Shurman for About.com [http://israeliculture.about.com/culture/israeliculture/library/weekly/aa121399a.htm].

He traces the Israeli hesitation about peace with Syria, and he focuses on the key issues of borders, water rights, security issues and a timetable for Israeli withdrawal.

Shurman has even set up an (unscientific) poll about the chances of peace with Syria [http://israeliculture.about.com/culture/israeliculture/library/polls/blpoll10.htm].

When I last looked, 38 percent of respondents were optimistic about peace, 45 percent said the Syrians don't really want peace, and 12 percent felt Israeli citizens won't give up the Golan. Any withdrawal from the Golan will require a genuine nationwide referendum and approval by at least 61 members of Knesset [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/Peace/golantoc.html].

Next week, more on the Golan, including the main lobby groups within Israel and a view of the Syrian perspective on the Web.

Jewish Life

Speaking for interfaith dialogue

By BETH PORTER

Guest Voice

As a Roman Catholic, I knew almost nothing about the Jewish community or Judaism when, in 1989, my friend Ellen Weinstein remarked to me with pain during an Easter season service, "I'm a Jew, but I didn't kill Jesus!"

I was shocked as I listened to the scripture passage with my friend's ears and heard the anti-Jewish polemic, and I was deeply disturbed that a text in which I and other Christians found hope could contain such poison. I was disturbed also that I had not previously noticed it.

This article is an account of transformation at the personal and communal level, and increasingly, in small ways, at the societal level. The transformation was wrought as a result of personal encounters between Jews and Christians, and because people with developmental disabilities have a gift that enables them to call us all beyond ourselves and into relationship with "the other."

Ellen and I live in L'Arche Daybreak in Richmond Hill, Ont., a community for people with developmental disabilities and the friends who assist them. L'Arche, an international federation of such communities founded by Jean Vanier, has strong Christian roots, but has some members of other faiths. Its family-like lifestyle attracted Ellen's parents when they were looking for a home for their adult daughter.

As an assistant, I was drawn to L'Arche by its vision of a community where people with disabilities are valued and recognized as a source of blessing for others, and by its desire, stated in the L'Arche Charter, to be in solidarity with all those who work for justice.

Ellen's remark at that Easter service initiated an awakening that continued as I undertook theological studies and began to search for ways to help Ellen be affirmed in her own faith. Ellen's parents had long facilitated our celebrating Passover, but now the presence of Jewish members at Daybreak took on other rich dimensions for the rest of us.

Ellen and I found a welcoming Jewish congregation, Kehilat Ahavat Hesed in Toronto. Ellen celebrated her bat mitzvah in 1994 – a joyous occasion. Two years later, Mel Kirzner, another Daybreak member, had a bar mitzvah. Ellen's and Mel's growth in self-esteem and confidence has been obvious to all.

'Deeply touched by survivor speakers'

Kehilah members comment that Ellen and Mel contribute in important ways by their friendliness and need for support that makes everyone more attentive.

Those of us from Daybreak who attend services with them are greatly enriched as we learn more about the Hebrew scriptures and recognize the Jewish roots of Christian liturgy. Meanwhile, our L'Arche community is being transformed by a new appreciation for Judaism.

'Recognize Jewish roots of Christian liturgy'

Last year, Mel travelled with Daybreak friends to Poland and Israel. "I wanted to see where my ancestors came from," he explains.

He also spoke on panels at Reena's International Conference on Developmental Disabilities and at the 16th National Workshop on Jewish-Christian Relations in Houston.

My studies, which included courses in Israel, gave me a foundation for talking and writing about anti-Judaism as an issue of justice that Christians need to address and to suggest an articulation of Christian theology that allows space for religious pluralism.

I became active in Christian-Jewish Dialogue and was deeply touched by survivor speakers when I co-ordinated Holocaust Education Week programs in churches. My first article (for the Catholic New Times) was about Holocaust denial. Last Easter, I was asked to write for the Catholic missalette about the anti-Semitic history associated with Good Friday, and the Pope's call for repentance and reconciliation.

More often, though, I prefer to focus on the vitality of contemporary Judaism and what it can teach us. I have become active in Women's Interfaith Dialogue and serve on the archdiocesan interfaith committee that is seeking to promote collegiality among priests and rabbis.

I am encouraged by the work of some Catholic bishops and theologians, and embarrassed by insensitive actions of the Church: the long refusal to recognize the State of Israel, the recent canonization of Edith Stein, the convent and crosses at Auschwitz.

Speaking out on matters that may be perceived by some as threatening to their faith can be lonely. I find encouragement at L'Arche and with other Catholics who have come to see the importance of Christian-Jewish relations, as well as in my friendships with people of diverse affiliations in the Jewish community.

The transformation I have described could only happen because Jewish people received and befriended me in spite of any negative feelings they may have had regarding my Roman Catholic identity or my gentile ineptitude – not knowing at first even what I could bring to a pot luck dinner in a kosher home, or not to take notes during Shabbat services! For their friendship and help, I am deeply grateful. May many others be open to building such bridges!

Can this shul be saved?

A magnificent old synagogue on Rumbach Street in Budapest is boarded up and rapidly decaying.

The synagogue, built in the style of the eastern European architects of the 19th century, has great historical value for the Jews of Hungary, although it was sold by the Jewish community to the city many years ago.

Within the last five to 10 years, there has been a resurgence of Jewish growth and awareness in Hungary, especially in Budapest, and Jews who for many years buried all traces of their heritage, are showing signs of Jewish pride and the desire to discover their roots.

Chabad Lubavitch has been established in Budapest under the direction of Rabbi Boruch Oberlander. Their goal is to try to serve the needs of the Jewish community at large, from the Orthodox to the unaffiliated to the assimilated.

The small synagogue Lubavitch currently uses has a yeshiva, complete with library, and offers daily classes, Shabbat services, and Shabbat meals for some 70 guests and students each week.

Chabad Lubavitch hopes to be able to purchase the larger Rumbach synagogue, which would allow it to expand its activities in the community.

The dream is ultimately to reopen and renovate the beautiful old synagogue and restore it to its former position in the community as the centre of Jewish activity in Budapest and Hungary.

For more information, contact Chabad Lubavitch of Hungary, Budapest, Wessenlényi utca 4. I/1. 1075; phone +36(1)268-0183.

Le Maroc du roi Mohammed VI

nées de la préservation du patrimoine du judaïsme marocain, et le professeur Haïm Zafrani, auteur d'une imposante oeuvre historiographique consacrée au Juifs du Maroc, jouent un rôle très important au chapitre de la perpétuation de ce riche héritage.

Par ailleurs, je crois que c'est important pour la paix au Proche-Orient que le judaïsme marocain en Israël joue un rôle en faveur de la paix. Le parti religieux sépharade Shass, dont certains aspects sont critiquables, est incontestablement un facteur important de paix dans la société israélienne.

C.J.N.: La signature des accords d'Oslo et le rapprochement israélo-palestinien qu'ils ont favorisé ont-ils modéré vos positions radicales antisionistes?

A.S.: Antisioniste, je le suis toujours. La légitimité de l'État d'Israël telle qu'elle a été construite en 1948 je la conteste. Mais maintenant les faits sont là. Je peux vous dire que le jour où j'ai lu les accords d'Oslo avant même qu'ils soient signés à Washington, en septembre 1993, j'étais immédiatement pour et d'une façon enthousiaste. C'est la seule voie de la paix. File est difficile mais c'est l'unique voie susceptible de mener à une paix juste pour les deux parties. Je suis pour un État d'Israël et un État palestinien vivant côte à côte en convivialité. Deux entités étatiques démocratiques qui, conjointement, pourraient être le pôle principal du progrès au Proche-Orient. Je pense que la dynamique même des choses poussera l'État d'Israël à dépasser le sionisme et à aller vers ce qu'on appelle le post-sionisme. L'État hébreu deviendra alors l'État de tous ses citoyens juifs et musulmans ou d'autres religions.

C.J.N.: Vos prises de position controversées sur la marocanité du Sahara vous ont valu bien des déboires et des années d'emprisonnement. Contestez-vous toujours les revendications territoriales du Royaume chérifien sur le Sahara?

A.S.: Je reconnais que j'ai été trop loin dans certaines de mes déclarations faites en prison dans les années 70. Cependant, je crois que les événements actuels me donnent raison. La meilleure voie est celle d'une solution négociée ni vainqueur ni vaincu qui permettrait entre l'autonomie ou l'État associé de maintenir le Sahara dans la mouvance marocaine. Cette solution permettrait de maintenir l'équilibre géopolitique du Maghreb et de reconnaître la personnalité Sahraoui et son droit à vivre de façon autonome soit dans un État associé soit dans un statut d'autonomie très large.

Depuis son accession au trône, le roi Mohammed VI a fait des pas en avant importants dans la voie politique et non pas dans la voie répressive comme c'était le cas lorsque Driss Basri -ancien ministre de l'Intérieur limogé par Mohammed VI- était le grand chef de la question du Sahara.

Abraham Serfaty was imprisoned for 17 years in Morocco for his opposition to King Hassan II and then exiled to France. He was recently pardoned by the new king, Mohammed VI, and allowed to return to Morocco.

Announcements coming in spring

Fellowships for 'future educators, diplomats'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The first three Canadian recipients of special fellowships awarded by Bar-Ilan University's Begin-Sadat Centre for Strategic Studies (BESA) are due to be announced by early spring, said the centre's Montreal founder.

The fellowship was conceived of last September by BESA founder Thomas Hecht, as a means to cultivate and nurture future academicians and Canadian diplomats.

In a recent interview, Hecht said he is pleased that the the selections will be made so soon. Applications for the fellowships are being accepted until the end of February.

"We need future academic educators and future diplomats," said Hecht, who in 1993 established BESA as an independent institute for strategic studies, particularly on Middle East issues.

"We think that in making these selections and sending future academicians to Israel, especially in the area of strategic studies, we will have a better understanding of the facts on the ground."

If the fellowship winners wish to become diplomats, they, "will have the orientation they need for their future careers," he said.

The fellowships will be granted on an annual basis and are being paid for by Hecht. He said the grants will amount to $25,000 each year, which will pay for a semester of post-graduate study in geopolitical and strategic studies at Bar-Ilan, which is located in the Tel Aviv suburb of Ramat Gan. The fellowships will provide tuition fees, travel costs, housing and basic expenses.

The administration of the program is under the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre of the Bronfman Israel Experience Centre at the new campus of FEDERATION CJA.

For Hecht, the fellowships signify another important milestone for BESA, which since its inception has attracted some of the world's most respected scholars and prestigious names within its academic ranks and on its international advisory board.

On the academic side, for example, they include professors Efraim Inbar, Eliyahu Kanofsky, Gerald Steinberg, Barry Rubin and Shmuel Sandler. Its international advisory board includes Brian Mulroney, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan, Yuval Neeman and former Canadian ambassador to Israel Norman Spector.

BESA also organizes international conferences and publishes frequent strategic studies articles, as well as a periodic bulletin. Three years ago, it launched an Internet publication, called the Middle East Review of International Affairs (MERIA), which is among the most popular such sites on the Lycos search engine and is available at the Bar-Ilan Web site www.biu.ac.il/SOC/besa.

BESA has flourished, Hecht said, because it has been able to fill a particular niche by laying the groundwork for improved diplomatic relations with other countries.

Before Israel solidified its relations with Turkey, India and South Korea, for example, BESA tested the waters by organizing colloquia that focused on Israel's ties with these nations.

Hecht likened BESA's role to being an, "advance man for Israeli foreign affairs."

And despite Hecht's admittedly conservative approach to Middle East issues, BESA, he said, has made it a point to be independent and non-partisan, drawing scholars, articles and researchers from across the political spectrum.

When BESA was launched, he said, there was a perception that the institute was politically conservative. But BESA could not have achieved the success it has, he added, had it not sought "the highest level of academic excellence" from the left, right, and centre.

Affidavits claim Weiz role in Baranovski attack

By PAUL LUNGEN & VIVA PRESS
CJN Staff

A media-generated atmosphere of "hysteria" would prevent Israeli soldier Daniel Weiz from receiving a fair trial in Toronto if such a trial was held today, his Canadian lawyer asserted last week.

"This is obviously quite an incendiary case, an emotional case, a tragic case," Edward Greenspan told The CJN. "It's obviously angered the entire community...I think when you're in that kind of explosive case, you have to sit back and ask if there's any chance for a quiet dispensing of justice that's required, as opposed to hysteria and the reaction of an angry public."

Greenspan, one of Canada's foremost defence lawyers, was commenting about a flurry of media reports describing affidavits that have been presented to Israeli authorities in support of Canada's bid to extradite Weiz.

Weiz, 19, faces second-degree murder charges in the Nov. 14 beating death of Dmitri (Matti) Baranovski, 15. Also charged are Michael Issariotis, 19, and two juveniles, who cannot be identified.

An Israeli citizen, Weiz left Canada about a week after the murder. He has denied the charges against him and called the allegations in the affidavits "BS."

Last week, the Toronto and national media reported that the affidavits claimed Weiz played a role in the attack on Baranovski. One witness, described as a close friend of one member of the group that attacked Baranovski, said in his affidavit: "I had told them to stop. They ignored me and all three continued to kick Baranovski at the same time. In total, I saw eight to 10 kicks administered by 'juvenile A,' 'juvenile B' and Weiz."

"I did not see anyone else attack Baranovski," the witness stated.

"Just before the final kick, Dmitri put his hands on the pavement and I could hear him choking. 'Juvenile A' kicked him in the face in an upward motion, so that his head snapped back and then went straight into the pavement. After that final kick, Dmitri lay motionless and silent on the ground."

The witness said 13 young people witnessed "the brutal beating administered to Baranovski by Weiz, 'juvenile A' and 'juvenile B'."

The attack occurred after a gang entered G. Ross Lord Park looking for another group they wished to fight. When they couldn't find the other gang, they turned on a group of six youths sitting at a bench. After asking Baranovski for a cigarette, one of the youths grabbed his pack. When Baranovski walked away, he told the youth to leave him "the hell" alone. The attack began shortly afterwards.

Material forwarded to Israel included affidavits from Weiz's father, Edward; Weiz's stepmother, Marina Vaisburd; and his best friend.

In his affidavit, Weiz's friend stated Weiz told him after the murder that someone "had stepped on the boy's head and had given him a 'jawbreaker'."

Edward Weiz stated in his affidavit that his son acted strangely the night of the killing, washing his boots, including the soles.

"I have never known my son to wash his shoes in such a manner before," the father stated.

Vaisburd stated that Daniel returned home on the evening of the killing after spending two nights sleeping elsewhere. He went straight to his room, which she found unusual, as he usually removed his shoes in the doorway. The next evening, she said she saw Daniel come from the direction of his bedroom washroom and carry his shoes to the front hall.

"I saw they were completely clean, even on the soles, as if they had been washed with water. I have never seen him clean his shoes before."

Vaisburd said he spent the next three days alone in his room.

A few days later she drove him to the Israeli consulate because he wanted to return to Israel.

"He was very, very nervous...I asked him why he was so nervous and he told me that every time he looked up, he thought it was the police coming to take him."

In his affidavit, Edward Weiz stated his son moved in with him in September 1999 and said he wanted to remain in Canada because life in Israel was too difficult. Daniel, who refused to get a job, was arrested in late October for robbery and was sentenced to 14 days in jail. Weiz said his son phoned him while in jail and said he changed his mind and wanted to return to Israel and the army. He was released on Nov. 10.

Greenspan said the affidavits released in Israel are "allegations... that have never been the subject of cross-examination. People should withhold judgment until all the evidence is in."

Early last week, Owen Wigderson, lawyer for one of the young offenders, asked the Superior Court of Justice to order a publication ban on all material released in Israel.

Judge Michael Dombrot rejected Wigderson's application, siding with the media, which argued for the right to publish on the basis of freedom of expression.

In Israel, meanwhile, Weiz's lawyer Nitzana Darshan-Leitner told The CJN there are differences between the Weiz case and one that involved Maryland teenager Samuel Sheinbein, who fled to Israel in September 1997 after murdering a friend.

"It's not similar because Sheinbein couldn't be extradited," she said. Israel's extradition law, which barred the removal of Israeli citizens, was subsequently changed after Sheinbein was found guilty of the crime in an Israeli court.

Darshan-Leitner said Weiz "did not run away from the Canadian police here."

23-year-old killed in robbery

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Niv Erez, who was shot to death in a Jan. 16 jewelry store heist in Richmond Hill, was remembered as a well-tempered, outgoing young man with a kind word for everyone.

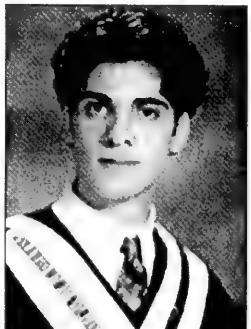
Erez, a 23-year-old store employee, died almost instantly after being hit by a volley of bullets fired by gunmen who robbed M. Lash Enterprises Ltd. in the Highway 7 and 404 area.

The owner of the store, Mark Lash, 36, was recovering in hospital last week from gunshot wounds to the stomach.

Several hundred people came to Erez's funeral last Tuesday at Steeles College Memorial Chapel. He was laid to rest at Pardes Shalom Cemetery.

Erez graduated from Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) in 1994. "He was very friendly. He is remembered by teachers as a sensitive, warm, popular young man," CHAT principal Paul Shaviv told The CJN.

He said students at the school were "grief-stricken" by the news of Erez's death, adding it was too early to say whether the school would hold a memorial service for him.



Niv Erez in 1994

Erez spent one year, from 1995 to '96, immersed in Jewish studies at Tel Aviv University.

His family was not commenting on the shooting last week. They moved to Toronto from Israel in 1982. His father Yehuda is a developer, while his mother Chana has volunteered for Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada. The family lives in Thornhill.

"He was friendly and outgoing; a warm type," recalled Rabbi Howard Sacknovitz, CHAT's longtime director of guidance. "He played a portable keyboard. He was very musically talented...a very sweet kid."

Erez was "extremely nice, always smiling, very well-liked," remembers his classmate Joshua Rucker.

A quotation accompanying Erez's graduating photograph in the CHAT yearbook states: "Don't be dismayed at goodbyes. A farewell is necessary before u can meet again. And meeting again after moments or lifetimes is certain for those who are friends."

Apart from his parents, Erez leaves a sister, Hila, 25, and a brother, Tzvi, 32.

York Region police say two gunmen, possibly more, ambushed Erez and Lash, who arrived at the shop late Sunday to move a large quantity of gold, diamonds and jewelry to another building about two blocks away, where the business was relocating.

The assailants smashed through the ceiling of the store shortly before midnight. Police believe the gunmen opened fire soon after entering the store.

Individuals with information are being encouraged to call police investigators at 905-881-1221, ext. 7865, or Crime Stoppers at 416-222-8477.

Na'amat president follows mom's lead

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With the installation of Marilyn Myers as national president of Na'amat Canada, the organization had a new first.

Following in the footsteps of her mother, Freda Sohmer, who had been national president in the early '70s, the pair became the first mother and daughter to take on that position.

Myers, elected for a three-year term at the national convention held in Vancouver last fall, said her mother, who died seven years ago, influenced her to join the organization when she first came to Toronto from Montreal 30 years ago. "She would have taken great pride in seeing me installed."

Since joining the organization

Marilyn Myers

Myers, who is a full-time teacher at a private elementary school, has been, among other positions, Toronto council president, membership chair, bazaar chair, and chair of a Toronto and national convention.

Growing up, said Myers, her parents instilled in her a sense of commitment to the community. "There was no question that we all had to do whatever we could, and that it was our duty to do something for Israel."

The organization is in the forefront of women's issues in Israel, she said. "Our focus has changed over the years as the needs of women have changed. As more and more women began entering the workforce, we opened some of the first day-care centres in the country.

"We closed our day and night homes – for children who needed a place to live away from their parents – when it was decided that the children would be better off in foster homes."

Na'amat now focuses a lot of attention around the equality of women in the community, in the family and in the workplace. "We were one of the first organizations to realize that women have to fight for their rights. Our organization seems to find what is wrong in Israeli society, and then lobbies for change."

Locally, she said, they try to mirror what is done in Israel. In Toronto, free legal advice is given at the Ruth Rotman Legal Advisory clinic, run by volunteer women lawyers; and organization volunteers often collect and deliver such items as school supplies, holiday gifts, clothing, food and baby items to shelters.

Another program, Bouncing Back, revolves around teaching conflict resolution in the classroom.

As the organization is set to celebrate its 75th anniversary, Myers said it is a challenging time to be president. "The organization has chapters in nine cities across the country, and I intend to spend some time in each city. It's very important for us all to share ideas.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

By now you must be getting tired of all our discussions that revolve around leadership races, leadership jockeying and leadership profiles.

First it's the Liberal wannabes and their attempts to edge Chrétien towards retirement. Then we segue to the Reformers and Preston Manning's valiant efforts to hang on to his position. Then we return to the Liberals...and so it has been for the last three years.

What's wrong with this picture? What's wrong is that for the longest time, federal politics seems to be more about politics rather than policy.

Every declaration by a cabinet minister is assessed simply in terms of how it may impact on his or her leadership aspirations.

Alan Rock's splashy anti-smoking campaign leading with the new regulations governing cigarette packaging is a good case in point. More ink and videotape was spent on how the popularity of his initiative will help stave off an apparent move by Brian Tobin to move past him in the "whisper" leadership race than on the merits of the initiative itself.

It is particularly unfortunate that the media has chosen to focus on that angle, because the real story would have raised important questions about Rock's entire strategy.

But in another victory of form over substance, Canadians will likely never be aware that every study done on the relationship between youth and cigarette packaging suggests that Rock's plan is at best irrelevant to the level of smoking among Canadian youth. At worst, it will actually encourage increased smoking levels.

Surely, Rock's efforts could have been better spent squeezing some money from his caucus colleague (read – leadership rival) Paul Martin to help ease the acute-care meltdown faced by hospitals across the country.

Of course, then Rock would have had to share the stage with Martin in the first instance and then with all of his provincial counterparts who would get the public credit for actually doling out the money to those needy emergency rooms.

This is the pattern that has entrenched itself in federal politics: ministers who are more interested in profile than in their departments; opposition parties more interested in maintaining control over their fiefdoms than in providing Canadians with credible alternatives to the government.

It is time to get this picture into better focus.

Mayer Lerner was a leader in London's Jewish community

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mayer Lerner, a prominent jurist who was a mainstay of the London Jewish community for more than 40 years, died recently of pneumonia and heart failure. He was 93.

Obituary

"Mayer was a fearless advocate and a loyal friend," said his partner and longtime friend Earl Cherniak. As a young lawyer attempting to build a practice in London in the 1930s, Lerner turned to the "little guy" to form his client base. He developed a province-wide reputation and was "a wonderful jury lawyer," Cherniak said.

"Mayer Lerner had two sides to him," said Bob Siskind, whose father, Abe, was a close friend of Lerner's.

"He was very hard working, a tough but fair litigation lawyer. He was a strong believer in the fairness of the law.

"He was also very devoted to his two children (a daughter pre-deceased him) and he was very close to his son, Mark. He had a very strong sense of being Jewish and he commissioned a history of the Jewish community of London," Siskind said.

From humble beginnings, Lerner founded a law firm that numbered 15 lawyers when he took a seat on the bench in 1971 and which now includes 80 lawyers.

Cherniak, who delivered the eulogy at his funeral, said it was difficult for a Jew like Lerner to find a job at an established London firm in the 1930s.

"He had a lot of strikes against him, but by force of his abilities he made for himself a province-wide reputation...He built the reputation of the firm to work for the ordinary citizen. It's still a big part of the practice of the firm."

Driven by "a tremendous drive and the will to succeed," Lerner "was totally dedicated to his clients," Cherniak added.

When he wasn't wearing his lawyer's robes, Lerner was "a character. He was a man of very strong opinions and he never had any difficulty expressing them," his friend added.

Lerner's tenure on the bench is remembered for several momentous decisions. In 1978, he helped stop the proposed Spadina Expressway at Eglinton Avenue while around the same time, he struck down a contract signed by hockey player John Tonelli with the Houston Aeros of the World Hockey Association on the grounds that at 17, Tonelli was legally an infant.

When he was appointed in 1971, Lerner became the second Jewish member of the Supreme Court of Ontario. He retired from the bench in 1981 but continued to work as a pre-trial commissioner and on the review board of the Ontario College of Physicians and Surgeons.

Lerner was active in the London United Jewish Appeal and at the Or Shalom Synagogue prior to 1971. He was a member of Temple Israel in his later years. He is survived by his son Mark, his second wife, Jane, four grandchildren and two great grandchildren. His first wife, Ethel, died in 1971.

Reuben Slonim, pulpit rabbi and newspaper editor dies at 85

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Reuben Slonim died Jan. 20 at his home, a victim of a stroke and Alzheimer's disease. He was 85.

Obituary

He had been in ill health for the past year, according to his daughter, Rena Tsur.

The funeral was held last Friday at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel.

The controversial rabbi was spiritual leader of the McCaul Street Synagogue from the 1930s until after it merged with Goel Tzedec to become the Beth Tzedec Congregation. Rabbi Slonim served at the new Beth Tzedec for one year.

Following his exit from Beth Tzedec, he served for 23 years as rabbi of Beth Habonim on Glen Park Avenue.

After Rabbi Slonim had written a series of articles on Israel, he became associate editor of the now defunct Telegram, at the invitation of publisher John Bassett.

His later trips to Israel and interviews with Jewish and Arab leaders led to articles which many in the Jewish community felt were unfair to Israel, and his congregation at Beth Habonim dwindled as the result of controversy swirling around him.

Until a year ago, Rabbi Slonim headed the Association for the Living Jewish Spirit, which held High Holy Day services at the Unitarian Congregation on St. Clair Avenue.

Born in Winnipeg, he spent his early years at the Jewish orphanage where he was placed after his father died and his mother went to work there as a cook.

"In the past year my father was too sick to know about the negotiations between Israel and Syria, but he felt vindicated by the peace accords signed in Oslo," Rabbi Slonim's daughter said.

"He never at any time expressed anger at the Jewish community where his views were unpopular."

At Beth Tzedec in December 1998, Rabbi Slonim was honoured for his 61 years in the rabbinate.

His wife, Reta, predeceased him six years ago.

He is survived by his daughter and son-in-law, Barry, and two grandchildren, Ramon, 36, and Tali, 35, both of Toronto.

Time of your life

There's lots to do in retirement, 70-year-old says

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

MONTREAL — Seven years ago, Otto Sand, a shareholder in a menswear manufacturer, was faced with a decision – to relocate with his company to Toronto or to retire in Montreal.

"I decided to stay here, because I love Montreal and I value our standard of living," says Sand, 70, pointing out the proximity to the Laurentians and New England.

In 1948, Sand, a native of Czechoslovakia, immigrated to Israel. At 21, he settled in Montreal. "I would have liked to continue on at school but I had to make a living," he relates, adding he worked for more than 40 years in manufacturing and sales.

"I didn't have much time for organized exercise and courses during my working years but fortunately I developed an interest in both at a young age. Besides, there's lots to do after retirement. It's up to the individual to take advantage of what's out there."

Sand practises what he preaches. Immediately after retirement, he volunteered to deliver Meals on Wheels. "It's such a worthy cause," he says. "And I learned something. Most of the recipients are as happy to have your company as they are to receive the food. What they really appreciate is the five minutes you spend chatting with them."

Soon after, Sand decided to indulge himself in the organized exercise classes and university courses that he had put on hold. He discovered a cultural component seven years ago at the McGill Institute for Learning in Retirement.

"We're 700 members and we have 48 courses to choose from," says Sand, who serves as treasurer of a 16-member committee. He takes full courses every fall and winter.

"I'm mostly interested in world economy, globalization and world events that changed history. It's participatory, so we conduct our own research and take turns giving presentations."

In addition, Sand enrolled in organized exercise classes at the Jewish Community Centre. Last year, he was asked to chair the Y's athletic fitness and health committee. Now he is busy running to meetings.

As for skiing, Sand admits that it has been part of his lifestyle since the age of four. "I'm as comfortable on a ski hill as I am walking in shoes or relaxing in slippers at home. My wife [Susan] and I still travel to our family hide-away in Vermont, where we ski every weekend."

Upon reflection, Sand says he has found it easier to adapt to retirement, than to get accustomed to his daughters living out of town.

His married daughter, Nina, is a pediatrician at Dartmouth Hitchcock Hospital in New Hampshire and Carrie is completing a law degree and a master's in education at the University of Toronto.

"We speak on the phone daily but Susan and I miss them dearly," says Sand, adding the birth of his grandson five months ago has brought the family a lot of pleasure. "It's been the thrill of our lifetime."

You're only as old as you feel

Don't be fooled by labels. They myth that you are suddenly old at 65 isn't true.

Genetics and overall health play an important role in the rate of aging. However, nutrition, exercise and attitude are also contributing factors.

This is a good age to get involved in hobbies and organizations that you may have put on hold during the hectic years of raising a family and pursuing a career.

Statistics Canada says exercise is the most important way to keep fit, trim and healthy. If you're not exercising, check with your physician to see what exercises are best for your health.

Among the exercises you can enjoy are walking, swimming, cycling, jogging and dancing. Bowling, badminton and tennis can also be beneficial.

The trick is to start slowly if you have never exercised before. Start with a regular short routine and gradually work up to a 30-minute regular routine.

Good nutrition is essential. Cut down on excess salt, sweets, fats, snacks and liquor.

Choose foods high in nutrients. Unless your doctor has prescribed a special diet, try a balanced diet of fresh vegetables, especially leafy greens, fresh fruits, low-fat dairy products, beans or meat, and whole grains.

Adding fibre to the diet, like bran, whole grain breads and cereals, will aid in digestion and avoid constipation.

Calcium is critical in maintaining strong bones and teeth, and is found in a wide variety of foods. Good sources are dairy products, collards, kale, broccoli, salmon and sardines.

For women, calcium intake is essential as it helps fight bone loss associated with age.

Arafat floats concept of September statehood

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretzDaily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat completed his official visit to Washington last week with a traditional Shabbat dinner held in his honour by Jewish peace activists.

As in his previous visits to Washington, Arafat refused to comment on whether the Israeli and Palestinian negotiating teams will meet the Feb. 13 deadline for reaching a framework for a final settlement agreement.

On his first ever visit to the International Monetary Fund, Arafat said that the Palestinian people reserve the right to pronounce their independence in September 2000, which is the deadline for the end of negotiations. The head of the Palestinian Authority said that this right was clearly established by the Sharm el Sheikh accord of September 1999.

The agreement sets a Sept. 13 deadline for the final settlement negotiations but does not postulate that an independent Palestinian state will be part of such an agreement.

Palestinian officials are saying that given the delays in the timetable of negotiations, international law gives them the right to declare their independence, even without Israel's agreement.

In a Washington speech, Arafat clarified that he postponed the Palestinian declaration of independence last May, and that it was agreed in Sharm that it would be made on Sept. 13.

When asked whether this matter was discussed with President Bill Clinton, Arafat said that "we discussed our rights which were agreed upon at Sharm and were postponed to Sept. 13 with Barak's agreement."

Pointing to PA institutions as sources of decision making, Arafat said: "I am not a dictator. We have a parliament and institutions, and they have to make the decision."

During his visit to the IMF, Arafat discussed with first deputy managing director, Stanley Fischer, the PA's need for technical assistance. The IMF cannot make loans to the PA because it is not a sovereign state, although an IMF delegation will visit the PA authority at the end of this month.

Earlier this month, a new body to oversee PA financial administration was established. The Investment Fund will manage PA assets and investments, while taxation will come under the finance ministry. The IMF welcomed these changes.

Prior to his meeting with Fischer, Arafat met with 40 Jewish businesspeople and encouraged them to invest in the PA territories for the sake of peace in the region.

Olmert: Barak isn't dividing Jerusalem

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak does not intend to transfer areas bordering on Jerusalem, such as the village of Abu Dis, to the Palestinian Authority.

Furthermore, Ehud Olmert, the mayor of Jerusalem, told leaders of the Yesha Council of Jewish settlements that Barak does not intend to grant the PA various powers in Arab neighbourhoods in north Jerusalem.

Press reports about Barak's intentions led the Yesha Council leaders and the Forum for Metropolitan Jerusalem (led by Benny Kashriel, the mayor of Ma'aleh Adumim, just east of Jerusalem), to ask Olmert to lead the political struggle to keep Jerusalem unified.

Olmert, however, declined, and told the West Bank activists that he had recently met with Barak and been convinced that neither the prime minister nor his aides were behind the reports – which, if true, would be tantamount to the partition of Jerusalem. Olmert said he would soon be meeting with Barak again.

Olmert told his interlocutors that in his talk with Barak he emphasized that if the PA were to receive security control over Abu Dis, this would give them a corridor leading toward the Temple Mount.

Transferring Arab neighbourhoods in north Jerusalem to the PA would have the effect of isolating the large Jewish neighbourhoods of Neve Yaakov and Pisgat Ze'ev, where 80,000 Israelis reside.

Olmert said he gave Barak a list of requests that must be acceded to in order to entrench Jerusalem's status: building between Ma'aleh Adumim and Jerusalem and between Ramot and Atarot; renewing the train to Jerusalem; completing the "eastern ring" road, and funding – frozen by the Barak government – to improve the infrastructure in east Jerusalem.

Mofaz confident of security

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz said last week he is certain that decision-makers are taking the nation's security needs into full account in their negotiations with Syria.

"I cannot imagine that they will arrive at a point where they will agree to peace agreements that do not contain a maximum provision for security," Mofaz told Channel 1 news.

He added that in his view, both Syria and Lebanon have a true desire to sign agreements with Israel.

The Syrians, he said, "have their own reasons" for embarking on the peace track, with their main motivation lying in the economic sphere.

"Israel, too, is truly striving for peace and has a desire to achieve maximum security in the agreements," Mofaz said.

He added that another motivating factor for the Syrians is their awareness that in a military clash with Israel, they will not be able to secure the same gains they can get through a peace treaty "because of the strength and might of Israel and the IDF."

Mofaz said that at this stage, he sees no reason why he has to take part in the security talks, and prefers to have the IDF represented by the head of the General Staff Planning Branch, Major General Shlomo Yanai.

"If the Syrian chief of staff decides to take part in the security negotiations at some stage, it is very possible that I will be sitting opposite him," Mofaz said.

Three weeks ago, Mofaz said he would not flinch from expressing publicly his view on the security aspects of an agreement with Syria before its signing and before the referendum that would follow.

Asked about this last week, he said, "My task will be to ensure that my opinion will be completely unblemished, unbiased, purely professional and confined to the security issue."

It was the second time in less than a week that Mofaz expressed optimism concerning a peace treaty with Syria. Last week he told a press conference that he hopes to be "the chief of staff of peace."

bombing raid when the Israeli jet fighter he was flying in was shot down over southern Lebanon. The pilot was pulled out by a helicopter-equipped Israeli search-and-rescue team, but pursuing guerrillas closed in and later caught Arad.

There has been speculation that Arad may have died later in fighting in 1989, or was killed by his captors or even escaped. Hezbollah has repeatedly denied any knowledge of his whereabouts.

Nasrallah repeated to Spiegel his position that any turnover of Arad's body would only happen in exchange for prisoners held by the Israelis.

Earlier, Nasrallah had said the release of five Hezbollah guerrillas from Israeli jails on Dec. 26 was linked to the group's efforts to try to find out what happened to Arad. Germany mediated that release and flew the freed prisoners to Beirut.

Recently, Hezbollah released two militiamen it had captured from the Israeli-allied South Lebanese Army and Iran released a German citizen who had been sentenced to death in Tehran. These appear to be the initial stages of a bigger deal under which Hezbollah is to divulge information about Arad.

Israel declined to officially comment on any details of the report, but welcomed any effort to find Arad.

"Anything that would enhance the solution of the Ron Arad tragedy is something positive in my view. Every Israeli would answer in the same way," Uri Lubrani, the co-ordinator of Israeli policy on Lebanon, said in a phone interview from Jerusalem.

New 'revelation' in British Holocaust trial

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A British Holocaust revisionist who is suing a U.S. Holocaust scholar in a London court, has admitted that the Nazis "systematically" gassed 97,000 Jews in trucks.

David Irving, whose trial against Deborah Lipstadt, a professor of Emory University in Atlanta, is now entering its third week, said last week, that he was "willing to eat humble pie" after he admitted that he had been "quite plainly wrong" for statements in which he said the Nazis used gassing trucks "on a very limited scale to experiment."

Irving is suing Lipstadt and her British publisher, Penguin Books, over passages in her book, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory.

He says that by labelling him a denier of the Holocaust and accusing him of distorting historical data to suit his own ideological goals, Lipstadt has ruined his career as a writer and historian.

Irving told the High Court that what he had said in the past about the scale and number of the gas truck deaths was based on his knowledge at the time.

But under cross-examination by Richard Rampton, Irving admitted he was mistaken after he was shown a document that specified that 97,000 Jews were gassed in three trucks in a period of just five weeks.

When the judge, Justice Charles Gray, asked Irving if he would describe that as "very limited and experimental," Irving replied: "No, this is systematic."

In another exchange, Rampton said Irving must be "mad or a liar" to suggest Jews who were deported to the east during the war were not being sent to their deaths.

He was responding to a claim by Irving that messages intercepted by British wartime intelligence indicated trains transporting Jews to the camps were equipped with a "very substantial amount of food" and "tools of the trade" for their occupants.

Irving said this indicated "the system that was sending them was apprehending that they would be doing something when they got there."

Rampton asked why he thought the Jews were being sent to "little villages in the middle of nowhere" in eastern Poland in 1942.

"The documents do not tell me," replied Irving, adding that "there could be any number of convincing explanations."

At an earlier hearing, Irving told the judge that his extradition was being sought by a German court for telling a meeting in Germany that the gas chambers at Auschwitz were erected as a tourist attraction by Poland's postwar Communist regime.

Britain to reject Holocaust-denial law

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — The British government has rejected plans to make Holocaust denial a criminal offence, the country's home office minister told Parliament last week.

Mike O'Brien said such legislation, which had been supported by Prime Minister Tony Blair, could not easily "strike a balance between outlawing such offensive statements and ensuring that freedom of speech is not unduly restricted.

"Therefore, while the government is following carefully the current debates on this issue within the Jewish community and elsewhere, we have no immediate plan to introduce legislation."

The announcement came during a trial involving Holocaust revisionist David Irving, who is suing U.S. historian Deborah Lipstadt for libel in a British court for labelling him a Holocaust denier.

Holocaust denial is an offence in several European countries, including Germany, Austria and Lithuania.

In Britain, it is an offence under the 1986 Public Order Act to incite racial hatred, but Jewish groups say that the law has proved ineffective, and has provoked very few prosecutions.

While material denying the Holocaust might be considered offensive and untruthful, prosecutors say it is difficult to define incitement.

The decision not to legislate against Holocaust denial came just one week before the British government is expected to announce plans to institute an annual Holocaust memorial day on Jan. 27, the anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, beginning in 2001.

The formal announcement was expected to be made by Foreign Secretary Robin Cook on Wednesday at an international Holocaust conference in Sweden.

The liberation of Auschwitz is already marked on Jan. 27 each year in Germany and Sweden. The European Union also marks genocide remembrance day on that date.

The Week in Israel

Jan. 17

• At least 25 people were wounded by a bomb explosion in Hadera. No one was seriously hurt, although one person suffered moderate injuries. Police said a pipe bomb had been planted by Palestinian terrorists inside a trash can near the downtown district.

• David Klein was sworn in as governor of the Bank of Israel. Klein takes over from Jacob Frenkel.

• David Makovsky, the executive editor of the Jerusalem Post, announced his resignation, citing irreconcilable differences with the paper's management. Makovsky's announcement came one week after the vice-chairman of the paper's board of directors, Hirsh Goodman, stepped down.

Jan. 18

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak met Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to discuss the progress of peace discussions. Arafat subsequently complained that the meeting had yielded no concrete results.

Jan.19

• Citing references to the medical writings of Maimonides and those in the Talmud, two Israeli doctors nominated chicken soup for the World Health Organization's list of essential drugs.

• For the first time, Israel's budget for the year officially includes funding for the Conservative and Reform movements, the Education Ministry announced.

Jan. 20

• The attorney general ordered the police to open a criminal investigation into allegations President Ezer Weizman illegally accepted large sums of money while he served as a member of the Knesset and of the cabinet.

• A group of Israeli Arabs, for the first time, volunteered to perform national service.

Jan. 21

• The winners of the Israel Prize for Talmud research are professors Avraham Goldenberg and Yona Frenkel, Education Minister Yossi Sarid announced.

Weizman will not step down during investigation

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli President Ezer Weizman has announced he has no intention of stepping down, even though he has become the nation's first head of state to face a criminal investigation.

In a special televised address to the nation Sunday, Weizman refused to resign or take a leave of absence, pending the outcome of a police inquiry into whether he illegally accepted large sums of money from a French millionaire friend.

"I have never abandoned a battle, nor will I abandon this one," the former air force commander and fighter pilot said as he proclaimed his innocence.

Resigning or taking a voluntary leave from the largely ceremonial post would be akin to an admission of guilt, Weizman said.

"I have two ways to go, and in my opinion there is no middle ground," Weizman added, reading from a prepared statement. "One way is to fight for the truth to the end, and the other is to resign. I have no intention of resigning. I repeat: I have no intention of resigning."

He also said that going on leave is "not a solution."

Weizman, Israel's seventh president, has acknowledged accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars in gifts from Sudan-born businessman Edouard Saroussi from 1988 to 1993, when he served as a legislator and cabinet minister.

But he has insisted they were personal gifts that he was not required to declare.

Ezer Weizman looking stressed last week at a news conference.

In his brief statement, Weizman said he consulted with a lawyer who repeatedly told him his actions were legal and involved no improprieties.

"If I made a mistake, it was a human error and unintentional," Weizman said. "I have tried all my life to act with honesty and integrity."

An initial police probe into whether Weizman had properly reported the gifts turned into a criminal investigation after police reportedly discovered a business relationship between Weizman and Saroussi.

Since the allegations about the cash gift from Saroussi were first disclosed by an Israeli journalist several weeks ago, there have been growing calls from politicians for Weizman to step aside while the investigation is conducted.

The allegations against the president include a charge, raised by the journalist who first disclosed the affair, that Weizman indirectly accepted a $3-million bribe in 1984 to keep his now-defunct Yachad party out of a right-wing government.

A veteran public figure who held key posts in the military and in politics before becoming president, Weizman, 75, is now in the second term of his presidency, which has seen both left- and right-wing governments.

The outspoken Weizman has frequently been a counterbalance to government policy, pushing for progress when the peace process faltered, and urging a slowdown during waves of terrorist attacks.

Most recently, he gave his unequivocal support to an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights, in order to reach peace with Syria.

Holocaust forum in Stockholm

They were later joined by Israel, Germany, Poland, the Netherlands, France and Italy, and issued the following declaration: "Holocaust education, remembrance and research strengthens humanity's ability to absorb and learn from the dark lessons of the past so that we can ensure that similar horrors are never again repeated."

Gray said Sweden is leading a worldwide movement of Holocaust education and remembrance as a basis for learning about the past.

Canada, he said, "has been among the countries taking the lead in working to ensure that conditions in the world are such that the horrors of the Holocaust are not repeated."

The conference comes immediately after the meetings, also in Stockholm, of the executives of the World Jewish Congress and the World Jewish Restitution Organization. That gathering was to be chaired by Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel and Swedish prime minister Goran Persson. Ronen and Leipciger were slated to represent Canada.

Those meetings, Tuesday and Wednesday, were to examine a wide range of issues from around the world. Cotler was to deliver a report on Canada Between French (Quebec) and English (Ontario) – What is Canadian Jewish Identity?

The first meeting was to evaluate all the work that's been done to date on restitution to Holocaust survivors and heirs of its victims, including insurance policies, looted artwork and properties, as well as the $1.25 billion (US) legal settlement from Swiss banks and industries, and the two commissions that probed the war-era activities of Swiss banks.

On Tuesday night, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak was scheduled to join Wiesel, the Swedish prime minister, World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman and others in a tribute to Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish World War II hero credited with rescuing 100,000 Hungarian Jews from the Nazis.

But members of the Canadian delegation were particularly excited about the conference on teaching and remembering the Holocaust, as it would provide a chance to share ideas.

"It's an opportunity for various countries to exchange research and educational tools," said Mock before she left . "It's our hope that governments will implement and stress the importance of Holocaust education."

She said the League is currently conducting a study of Holocaust-related curricula in all Canadian provinces. Seeing what other countries do will help, she added.

Also on the Canadian agenda is a free-standing Holocaust museum in Ottawa. Ronen said CJC has authorized a model and plans for the building from Montreal architect Norman Glouberman.

North Korea warns Israel

BY AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Government sources last week responded harshly to North Korean warnings to Israel not to sell Harpy pilotless drones to South Korea.

Israeli sources said that "a country that supplies ballistic missiles to Iran, which threatens to use them against Israel, should check its own baggage before complaining about others."

The North Korean statement, issued in an official wire service report from the North Korean capital Pyongyang, said the $52 million deal "was a dangerous act of further aggravating the tense situation on the Korean peninsula."

The Harpy is a pilotless plane built in Israel with a range of 150 kilometres.

It is particularly effective against radar control stations, thus blinding anti-aircraft defence systems and enabling aircraft to penetrate enemy territory.

The only way to prevent Harpy attacks on radar control stations is to turn off radar, which in effect accomplishes the same thing as destroying radar stations – opening corridors of penetration for attack craft.

The deal with South Korea was signed three years ago but was announced only last week in Seoul.

Israel had expected a reaction from North Korea.

The main flaw in the Harpy system is that once launched, there is no way to land one, due to the plane's explosive payload, which could explode on impact.

Thus a Harpy is programmed to self-destruct after a predetermined period in the air.

The Harpy has been operational in the IDF arsenal since the beginning of the 1980s.

At the start of the last decade, the Defence Ministry has approved the drone's sale to foreign countries.

Other South Korean purchases of Israeli weapons include a $100-million Popeye missile deal.

Israel Aircraft Industries put in a bid for a deal to build an airborne early-warning aircraft (AWACS) for the South Korean Air Force, but the downturn in the South Korean economy in the late 1990s froze Seoul's plans for the plane.

With the apparent recovery in the Southeast Asian economic climate, IAI sources said they expect the tender to be reopened for bidding.

Israeli poverty levels spur debate

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Sometimes a rainstorm is more than just a rainstorm.

When torrential rains swept through Israel earlier this month, flooding out residents of poor neighbourhoods in southern Tel Aviv and Jaffa, upscale districts, just a short walk away, were unaffected.

As disadvantaged families abandoned their homes for shelter, some observers could not help but draw a parallel between Mother Nature's unusual discriminatory behaviour, and recent reports of rampant poverty in the Jewish state.

"How much longer can we close our eyes to the immense poverty around us," wondered Iris Mizrahi, a social commentator in Yediot Achronot, Israel's most popular daily.

"These rains may be a blessing for the farmers, but for the poor people they are a cursed rain, and for all of us, as a society, they are rains of embarrassment."

Similarly, a tough poverty report released last month by Israel's National Insurance Institute was embarrassing for many Israeli policymakers.

The report raised serious questions about whether Israel's socio-economic gaps are destined to grow wider as the country undergoes a transition from a labour-intensive economy to a knowledge-intensive one, while simultaneously, implementing free-market policies to integrate Israel's economy into the global marketplace.

The questions come as a public argument rages over the recent appointment of David Klein, senior director at the Bank of Israel, as the central bank's next governor.

Like Jacob Frenkel, the past governor of the Bank of Israel, Klein is known to favour reduced government spending and tough interest rate policies to combat inflation, and create a solid environment for the free market to generate economic growth. This is why he was nominated by Barak.

But critics – including several cabinet ministers – say that Israel needs to implement an expansionary economic policy by lowering interest rates to break loose from a three-year slowdown and conquer unemployment.

The data in the National Insurance Institute report, which referred to 1998, showed that 16.6 percent of all Israeli families – more than one million people, including 440,000 children – lived below the poverty line.

About 34 percent of Israeli families would be below the poverty line had they not received any government support.

Topping the poverty list, were Israeli Arabs and families with many children, indicating that large haredi families are among the poorest in Israel.

The report provided ammunition for critics of Prime Minister Ehud Barak, who say he has failed to deliver on his campaign promises to improve the economic lot of poorer people.

Even though the report referred to the period before his election, unemployment has since climbed to about nine percent from 8.5 percent in 1998, so it is assumed that the poverty situation has not improved.

Despite the public ruckus, the report actually showed very little change in poverty data from the previous year.

The real issue, says Momi Dahan, senior adviser to the finance ministry's director-general, is the widening gulf between rich and poor in Israel.

"If measured before the government intervenes and takes taxes or provides welfare payments, Israel is one of the most economically unequal societies in the world," says Dahan, an expert on social affairs and economics.

"But in terms of net disposable income, after the government intervenes, the inequalities are not so terrible. What this means, is that a significant slice of Israeli society is living off the government."

It also explains why, despite the poverty level, virtually nobody in Israel is starving.

Shlomo Swirski, a sociologist who heads the Adva Centre, a social research think-tank, says education plays a big role in creating economic disparities.

"There is a widening gap between those who have academic education and those who do not," he says. "In addition, one-third of Israelis who are working and bringing home wages, are living below the poverty line."

The differences can also be drawn along ethnic lines. A new report by the Adva Centre points out huge disparities among Ashkenazi Jews, Sephardi Jews and Israeli Arabs. According to 1997 data, Ashkenazi salaried workers earned 1.6 times more than the average Sephardi workers, and 1.9 times more than the average Israeli Arab workers.

In the 1990s, as Israel's economy climbed to near western European levels of income, not everyone reaped the benefits. The report shows that wealthier Israelis have benefited most, while the economic positions of the middle and lower classes have not dramatically changed.

The report argues that Israel's policy of reducing government spending is problematic because those who earn lower incomes cannot afford to pay for services if the government withdraws its support, further exacerbating the gulf between the haves and the have-nots.

But laissez-faire economic policy-makers and market players say that reducing government spending, and relying more on the private sector for economic growth, is exactly what Israel needs. Only these policies, they say, will help Israel integrate into the global economy, attract foreign investment and create jobs.

"It is obvious, that we are moving towards a more western and free-market economy, and we are getting there," says Eli Nahum, head trader at Nessuah Zannex Securities, a Tel Aviv brokerage.

"Of course, the price you almost always have to pay when an economy grows so fast is a widening gap between lower and higher socio-economic groups," he says, adding that the question is whether Israel is allocating enough for social welfare purposes.

The debate is playing itself out over the head of the Bank of Israel. It is also, in many ways, a product of the dramatic changes taking place in Israel as it shifts from a traditional socialist economy to a modern free market one that is driven by a dynamic high-tech sector.

But this shift is also partially responsible for the divide. Many traditional industries, such as agriculture and textiles, have been in decline. At the same time, technology industries have jobs to offer but many poorer Israelis do not have the skills to fill them.

The issue did not escape proponents of Israel's high-tech industry as they descended upon the Knesset earlier this month to mark Internet day with a gala celebration of the World Wide Web.

As the rain washed out southern Tel Aviv residents, leading high-tech companies exhibited their wares in the Knesset foyer. But meanwhile, the Knesset labour and social affairs committee debated whether the Internet revolution would help close the gaps in Israeli society or just make things worse.

Sheizaf Rafaeli, head of the Centre for the Study of the Information Society at the University of Haifa, told the committee that Israel must do more to make sure that the benefits of the Internet are available to everyone.

This includes reducing access costs to give all Israelis equal opportunity to access the Internet, and providing more Hebrew-language content. He also urged the government to take a more active role in promoting the Internet as a technology that can be used to bridge gaps.

"There is something in this technology that can give great opportunities to various sectors," said Rafaeli. "But there is reason to believe that what we will see is a widening of the gaps."

Sixth Annual CJN Purim Art Contest

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 16. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small or too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, February 21, 2000. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: Children will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 3, 2000.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 16, 2000. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Len Potechin faces off with Alexei Yashin

Ottawa senior strikes blow for fans everywhere

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In all his years in the real estate business, Len Potechin never had a reputation as a crusader who tilted at windmills or as a litigator who enjoyed his moment in court. During a career that spanned decades, he was never involved in a single case that went before the courts. Until now.

Today, the 73-year-old Ottawa Senators season ticket holder finds himself at the centre of a media feeding frenzy that stretches across North America and all the way to Europe. In cities where professional athletes command million-dollar salaries, news hounds and sports fans are curious to talk to the hockey fan who is spearheading a lawsuit against his team's star player, Alexei Yashin, and his agent, Mark Gandler.

Potechin has fielded calls from newspapers in Canada and the United States and has been interviewed by Time Magazine, ESPN, CBS, ABC and La Parisienne, a newspaper in Paris, not to mention numerous Canadian media outlets. His lawyer, Arthur Cogan, has been a guest on 20 radio talk shows in the United States.

They all want to know why Potechin launched the suit and whether he is serious in claiming $27.5 million in damages from Yashin and Gandler.

Potechin is only too glad to answer their queries and describe how he and a group of golfing buddies last summer got fed up with Yashin's whining and selfishness and decided to tell the star centre that enough is enough.

As season ticket holders, they were infuriated that Yashin was leaving the team in the lurch by walking out of a contract he had freely negotiated, that still had one year to run and that was due to pay him $3.6 million this season. Furthermore, Potechin was concerned by the example Yashin was setting for young people, particularly his grandchildren, who are avid hockey fans.

"This is an object lesson, both to the players and to kids, like our grandchildren," Potechin said. As he explained to his granddaughter, "even if you are a star player, you have to live by the rules. You can't just take your puck and go home."

Instead of accepting they were powerless spectators in the Senators' contract wars, Potechin and his golfing buddies called on Cogan, another member of their golfing fraternity but more significantly, a civil litigation lawyer who has been involved in many high profile cases, including the Somalia inquiry.

Cogan examined the facts and suggested a class action lawsuit in tort for Yashin's "intentional interference with the fans' contracts with the club."

Len Potechin

"I liken it to the opera," Potechin explained. "If the lead singers don't sing because they want double the money, that devalues my enjoyment... I've always said Yashin was worth the price of admission."

Ticket holders paid for an entertainment package that included Yashin and by not playing, he is reducing the value of those tickets. Furthermore, Yashin probably expected fans would put pressure on the Senators to renegotiate his contract or trade him, as was the case with Pavel Bure of the Vancouver Canucks last season, Cogan said.

Potechin's suit includes a claim for punitive damages against Yashin and "even more punitive damages from Gandler." Any funds received from the suit will go to charity once legal expenses are paid, he said.

Since going public with the suit last fall, Potechin has become something of a folk hero among disgruntled fans who are tired of placing their emotional support behind selfish, prima donna athletes.

Athletes, owners, agents and lawyers are keeping a keen eye on the proceedings, watching to see how Canada's legal system handles the case, which may have repercussions beyond the nation's capital.

"We hope to set a precedent for professional sports around the world," Potechin said. "This is a landmark case."

A few weeks ago, an Ontario court rejected Yashin's motion to throw out the case on the grounds it was frivolous or vexatious.

Yashin and his counsel have until Jan. 24 to file a defence. Should the case go ahead, Cogan said he is prepared to examine Yashin under oath to determine his mindset when he refused to honour his contract.

While all systems are go for the case to continue, Potechin said his original intention was "to get him to play. I'd accept him back. I'd rather have him playing for Ottawa than against Ottawa."

Potechin is a former hockey player himself, albeit not at Yashin's level. A native of Montreal, he played junior B in his hometown and in 1944, he played junior hockey for the Halifax Centrals and went to the Maritime championships. At one point, he was a pro prospect for an American Hockey League team but "my father opposed it."

Once he'd hung up his skates, he became a regular spectator of the Ottawa 67s, a major junior team, as well as Quebec Senior Hockey League games played in Ottawa.

He was thrilled when the NHL came to town and he became a season ticket holder in 1992. The tickets cost him $85 a game, or well over $3,000 a season.

Although he's mostly retired – he founded the Regional Group of Companies – he remains an honorary life member of five real estate organizations. He is past chair of the Board of Trade as well as the Ottawa Carleton Economic Development Association. He's also been a contributor to UJA and JNF campaigns and his family maintains a connection to ORT that spans five generations.

Small electrical appliances enrich culinary preparation

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

Career couples may lack the time and energy to attain culinary perfection on a daily basis. Nevertheless, it's important to start off the day with a decent breakfast, take time out for lunch and enjoy a nutritious dinner at night.

The market is flooded with gizmos to help do the job.

Models and prices vary according to who manufactures, markets and sells them. Similarly, a designer name or sophisticated feature will increase the cost.

Regardless of price, the user must take time to read the directions. Compliance to government regulations is paramount. Check to see everything is intact. Keep the directions and guarantee. The gadgets are designed to be user friendly.

The aroma of home-brewed coffee accompanied by freshly squeezed orange juice, piping hot cereal, and toasted challah may serve as an enticement for jumping out of bed on a dreary morning. With modern conveniences like programmed coffee-makers, cordless kettles, and toaster ovens, it's possible to consume the most important meal of the day and arrive on time for work.

And for those in the habit of munching toasted bagels or danishes en route, check out the electronic, wide slot, easy-control toasters. This is one way to avoid those burnt buns that have been squeezed into skinny bread slots.

Gone are the days when bubbie had to stand over steaming pots simmering on the stove. A cooker literally takes the "pressure" out of preparing pot roasts, puddings, soups, tzimmes, rice, chicken and vegetables. Furthermore, it's possible to seal in vitamins and lock in flavour.

The family chef can save up to two-thirds of the time normally spent fussing with conventional pots and pans. Look for pressure cookers that feature patented safety release valves, safety plugs, handle locks and stay-cool replaceable handles. For easy care and durability, you can't go wrong with stainless steel or copper cookware.

And for those who want dinner ready when they are, the slow cooker is a wise option. Styles vary but the same principle applies. That is, simply set and forget about supper. The slow cooker will hold four pounds of meat or vegetables. The heat is released in a wraparound manner. Portable, with easy-grip handles, the slow cooker boasts a stay-warm setting and a tempered glass lid.

A cordless kettle serves as a sensible gift, whether the recipient is interested or disinterested in home cuisine. For those who consider the kitchen a disaster zone, a cordless model is the answer. With automatic shutoff, drip-free removable covers and drip-free spouts, it's safe and easy.

Toaster ovens range from simple to sophisticated. After deciding on price, consider the potential user's needs. The convection toaster oven is ideal for the busy cook because it bakes, broils, toasts, defrosts and top browns. Automatic shut off and non-stick models alleviate monitoring and mess.

People like to gather for outdoor barbecues during the summer but indoor grills are equally efficient throughout the year. These table top grills are equipped with drain trays to catch the fat. Other commendable features include adjustable temperature controls and non-stick surfaces.

High power blenders and food processors also make fine gifts for potential, as well as experienced, chefs. Omelet makers, sandwich grillers, electric knives, electric can openers and a host of other innovative appliances are readily available at gift shops, hardware stores, department stores and outlets throughout Montreal.

House-cleaning tips

By RACHEL ALKALLAY
Special to The CJN

One of the most invigorating things to do for the soul and for the home is a good cleaning.

I recently went through a late autumn bout of cleaning. If truth be told, I'm still going through it, having moved to a new apartment. While attics, basements and storerooms are great for storing things of the "I'll look at them later" variety, the day of reckoning comes when you move.

But where to start? With trunks, boxes, filing cabinets and bags, all tempting you to burrow in, how do you decide where to begin? I take the easy way out – beginning with the smallest packages and working my way to the bigger containers – in the secret hope that by the time I finish with the small stuff, I'll be so tired and so busy with other projects that the big containers will be left for another time.

What's in that old shoebox? Business cards, hundreds and hundreds of business cards, many from companies that have long since gone out of business. Keep or throw out? Decisions, decisions.

How about the decorative tin box that used to contain chocolates? A dozen souvenirs from travels abroad, including three wooden squirrels with rhinestone eyes of blue, yellow and pink, a fluffy yellow chick, a porcelain egg holder and a plastic pencil case – not from my travels – and how did that get there, anyway?

The chick and the egg holder – garage sale material. The squirrels – keep them (can't possibly find anything made of wood nowadays that doesn't cost a fortune). The pencil case – well, it does hold memories. And the tin box itself, once disposable, is now a prized item: empty ones are sold for a good price as containers, so the blue and white flowered tin stays for another day.

Clothes that no longer fit or that you haven't worn in five years – Le Mercaz or the Salvation Army could make good use of them. If the fabric is too worn, the city of Montreal has a place that recycles old fabric, belts, shoes and purses.

Magazines that you meant to read but haven't gotten around to yet – recycle. Magazines can often be given to literacy centres, retirement homes, hospitals and doctors' offices (ask first).

Another suggestion is to have an unsentimental friend help you go through your stuff. There's nothing like an objective opinion – "That's junk!" – to make you realize that you can have more space to move around in.

Arts

Over 600 works, ranging in sizes up to 43 feet long

ARTS SCENE
By HEATHER SOLOMON

MONTREAL — Some 26 years ago, Morry Marcovitch answered a question that was plaguing him: What's a man to do when he's retired?

The answer for Marcovitch was: He paints.

Now he's grappling with another dilemma: What does he do with almost 600 paintings?

Keeps more than he allows out

Marcovitch has painted with the same drive he invested in the business he founded, the White Stag/ Don Parker mega-clothing company, but he never took the time to market his works and garner the public exposure that would have built his reputation in the art world.

As a result, the canvases have moved from warehouse to warehouse. The odd dozen brighten relatives' walls or have been sold to friends, if their home and office space allowed.

Even after a Zurich art dealer offered Marcovitch $4,000 for each of 14 canvases, he never shipped them. He's rejected two gallery offers of exhibitions, since they only had room for six to eight of his large-format pieces, and he wondered what to do with the rest.

Some 30 of his paintings do enliven the Jewish Rehabilitation Hospital for which he held a 1996 fund-raiser. A similar arrangement has benefited the building fund of the Jewish Community Centre seniors' home in Edmonton, where he lived and worked for 21 years before returning to Montreal.

Yet he recently took back his loan of a 43-foot-long colossus that had hung for 2½ years at Toronto's Koffler Gallery, one of his best sources of publicity.

He admits he has a hard time parting with his creations. "I didn't want to give it to them permanently. They wanted it, you know."

His unwillingness to give up the solid presence of his paintings can be traced back to the premature death of his father when Marcovitch was only 11, a shock that showed him how fleeting is a man's personal legacy.

His struggle to the top of a business world that, he felt, would have him leave no mark following retirement, also prompted his attachment. Art has been the concrete statement of his existence, he feels.

For a few years, he rented studio and gallery space in the Belgo Building, but he posted a Not for Sale sign beside his paintings.

Last year, Marcovitch published a book of his own art, to be made available, he says, only to those who acquire his paintings, But in the tug-of-war over his works, he ends up keeping more than he allows out.

"I would have had to change the whole direction of my thinking if I was interested in marketing," he says.

The œuvre of the 75-year-old artist who fondly refers to painting as his "addiction," is a combination of hard-edge, harking back to the plasticiens, and a fascinating abstract expressionism.

Marcovitch is a consummate colourist, but one who never formally attended to colour application. The hard-edge works to date have been unevenly brushed on, and only now is he considering the use of rollers to achieve uniformity. More amorphous work thrives on this same brushwork and takes his art to new heights.

Marcovitch admits to finding inspiration from other art that he's seen in magazines and in museums and galleries during his extensive travels.

But his own palette and genius for pattern and composition show these external cues to be simply an initial springboard.

Marcovitch is one of those fortunates who never suffers creative blockage. He thrives on colour-juxtaposition and shape/ground relationships, as is evident when you step into his home studio that's full of canvases, shelves of acrylic paint, and the exercise machinery that helps his body keep up with the activity of his mind.

He still clocks daily seven-hour sessions at his paint table and easel, hoping to turn out about 50 paintings this year that will celebrate his perennial delight in the act of creation.

Peru is a photographer's dream come true

By GERRY SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

A trip to eastern and central Peru involved travel by air, train, bus and boat in the Puno-Cusco-Arequipa corridor, the highlight of which was a visit to Machu-Picchu, one of the great sites of South America – a continent largely underrated and ignored by Canadian travellers.

The voyage began at the frontier of Bolivia and Peru on a public bus from Bolivia to Puno, Peru – both of which front on Lake Titicaca. I had come to see the famous Uros Islands made of floating reeds tightly lashed together, of which there are some 40 in total within an hour's boat ride of shore.

The local people, descendants of the ancient Inca, are famous for their tortoras (or reed boats) and have small self-sufficient communities, including elementary schools, on their islands. They tend animals and sell handicrafts (mainly woven woolen goods) to tourists.

The day I visited was cool but sunny and the unique way of life was very interesting to behold. I visited three islands, including Taquile which is famous for its weavings and where one can choose to spend an overnight visit with a family.

The following day dawned cold with a thin coating of snow on the streets of Puno and a new white snowfall on the surrounding peaks of the Andes. There is a narrow-gauge railway with colourful wagons which winds its way slowly to Cusco, the ancient political capital of the Inca and Spanish colonial centre, which is a few thousand feet lower than Lake Titicaca.

The train passed many small villages with herds of llama, alpaca and vicuna visible grazing on the sparse vegetation of the altiplano. We even stopped so local marathon runners and the school children cheering them on could cross the railway tracks.

This gave an opportunity for vendors to ply their wares to passengers and I bought a bag of eight home-baked cheese empanadas for 1 Peruvian sol (about 25 cents). Finally, the train entered the imperial capital of the ancient Inca kingdom – Cusco, the gateway to Machu-Picchu.

Though the railway station is drab, the historic inner city and surrounding plazas, just a short ride away, offers insight into the Spanish colonial past and evidence of the original Inca walls as well.

Many modern hotels are built around colonial haciendas hundreds of years old, and by going to cafes that locals go to, one can get the feel of the place, away from the bus tours.

The best was yet to come. The early train to Machu-Picchu takes you through the Valle Sacrado (Sacred Valley), following the meandering curves of the Urubamba River, and down subtropical levels ending at the village of Aguas Calientes. From this village, one may bus up or hike up to discover the "Lost City of the Inca" which was not "discovered" until 1925 by Hiram Bingham, an American.

Peru is full of young Israelis after army service doing their South American trip. There is an Israeli-Yemenite restaurant, called The Nargilah, with bilingual (Spanish-Hebrew) menus, though a smaller place, called Yaku Mama, nearby served excellent home-cooked food, and also catered to Israeli tourists.

There is a small but vital Jewish community centred in Lima. Like most countries of South America, Jews probably came as conversos with the Spanish invasion in 1532. Modern Jewish immigration began about 1870 with the arrival of Jews from central Europe and subsequent immigration from Turkey and North Africa. However, even at its peak after World War II, the population was only some 6000.

The central body is the Asociacion Judia del Peru in Lima. Henry Meiggs, American-born and Jewish, was instrumental in designing and supervising the building of the railway that "broke the spine of the Andes" in the late 1800s.

Book on Internet business devoid of any hyperbole

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Coordinator

MONTREAL — Business consultant and author Peter S. Cohan says the Internet is an effective vehicle to generate profit. The expert in business and technology resides in Massachusetts, where he runs his own consulting company.

In Net Profit, Cohan's latest hard cover text published by Jossey-Bass Inc., 1999 (Distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada), the author tells how to compete in the world of Internet business.

His earlier book, The Technology Leaders, was voted one of the top 10 business books of 1997 by Management General.

Based on CNBC's (Cable TV) stock tips, Cohan was big tipper.com's top tipper of 1998.

Cohan has a penchant for investing in Internet start-ups. In Net Profit, he instructs business managers on how to compete by using Internet technology to improve their business. He also explains how to use the Web for research.

The adage, necessity is the mother of invention, applies to the publication of Net Profit. When seeking information on Internet start-ups, Cohan discovered a lack of material on the subject. Hence, he decided to fill the void with this book. The beauty of this no-nonsense text is that it is devoid of hyperbole.

In Net Profit, Cohan provides a framework for evaluating potential Internet investments referred to as the Net Profit Retriever, the Web Business Pyramid and the Web Applications Pyramid. He also defines nine mutually exclusive and collectively exhaustive Internet business segments.

"An Internet business is a company that derives some or all of its revenues through the Internet," Cohan explains. Each Internet business segment is a distinct industry with unique competitors, customers, profit dynamics and requirements for competitive success.

He lists the following segments: Network infrastructure, Web consulting, Internet venture capital, Internet security, Web portals, Electronic commerce, Web content, Internet service providers (ISP), Web commerce tools.

Cohan shows readers how to analyze the world of Internet business as it undergoes changes. For example, he draws a Web Business Pyramid. This enables entrepreneurs to plan out where they want to go and to realize what their strategic options are for arriving there.

The author perceives patterns in Web business that relate to the Darwinian theory. Some companies will gain more economic leverage, whereas others will be merged out of existence.

For non-Internet managers, he shows the Web Applications Pyramid. This helps assess the costs and benefits of engaging in e-commerce. He embellishes the book with company case studies that show his theories in action.

The facilities he cites range from clothing retailers, such as U.S. Cavalry to America Online and other high-tech companies.

Cohan also describes vendors of products and services that firms need to consider as they advance with commerce initiatives.

In Net Profit, the author reviews services that offer consumers new ways to shop and do research. Like a good teacher, Cohan presents concrete examples to clarify abstract terms.

Thanks to Cohan's well-defined diagrams, discussions on Net Profit Retriever, the Web Business Pyramid, the Web Applications Pyramid, and the Web Content, categories are easily discernable.

Web commerce is not a panacea for impatient hopefuls seeking a quick fix.

To evaluate whether or not to buy the stock, the investor must understand the business.

The same philosophy applies here, says Cohan. Web investors need to understand the challenges Internet business managers face and they must be equipped to evaluate how well the managers are addressing these challenges.

Oh no, it's time to file your taxes

New changes are inevitable when it comes to preparing income taxes and this year is no exception.

Therefore, check with your accountant as well as the provincial and federal government agencies before making any assumptions.

The best way to beat the spring deadline is to start now. For example, make sure you received all the receipts for any charitable donations you've made. If not, phone now and remind the organizations to send them to you ASAP.

Often we assume tax receipts ensure a deduction but the amounts and the institutions accepted vary from year to year.

So check and maybe it pays to give a little more to a good cause than simply donating a small amount and not receive an income tax credit for it.

If you are expecting a refund because too much was taken off at source or you are owed money for other reasons, file early. The government does not start paying interest on your money until 45 days after April 30 or 45 days after you file your return.

Furthermore you can file your return electronically. According to Gene Katz, a Canadian tax advisor, personal tax software like Quicken Suite 2000 allows the user to enter different amounts and shows the user the various effects these changes have on that person's situation.

Miriam Home to change personnel policies

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The executive director of the Miriam Home and Services has vowed that from now on, all new staff hired will be checked for criminal records.

This statement came after it recently came to light that a convicted rapist was working with its most severely handicapped clients.

Marc Sougavinski told The CJN that, "This will not recur because the system will be so tight. It's a bad situation and we are taking it very seriously. The bottom line is it will not happen again. We have learned our lesson."

The staff at Miriam's Guimont Residence in Laval, home to 50 intellectually and, in some cases, physically handicapped teens and adults, alerted the administration that Patrick Lucien was one of two men convicted of the rape of a woman in 1996.

Lucien, 26, worked on call as an orderly for about three weeks in December. He was among a pool of replacement workers over the holidays.

Lucien's case was well-publicized because of comments about his and his friend's Haitian origin by the judge in handing down conditional sentences to the two men.

The judge allowed them to serve their time at home, instead of in prison, because she felt their lack of remorse was "related more to the cultural context, particularly with regard to relations with women, than a veritable problem of a sexual nature."

That ruling was overturned earlier this month by an Appeal Court judge who sentenced both men to 18-month jail sentences.

Guimont staff recognized Lucien from television coverage of the second trial.

Sougavinski said he is satisfied that Lucien did not do anything wrong while he was working at Guimont. "He was on a 30-day probation and during that time there is greater surveillance by supervisors."

Lucien's duties included providing personal care, like baths, to clients. Sougavinski, however, said it was unlikely he bathed any women because the residence's practice is to have staff of the same sex tend to clients as much as possible.

Sougavinski would not say if Lucien had previous experience in this type of work or what references he came with.

The Miriam Home's policy has never been to carry out police checks on employees at Guimont and this is the first incident of its kind anyone can recall in its 30-year history, he said.

However, researching the criminal history of those seeking to work in its network of small foster homes has been standard, Sougavinski said. Even volunteers' backgrounds are sometimes checked.

"Rightly or wrongly, we thought it was less risky in the residence. We are extra careful in the foster homes because these people live alone with the residents. At Guimont, because there is a large number of staff around and a probation period, there was an assumption of more security," he said.

Police checks are not the norm in public institutions, he added, even though there is nothing to prevent them.

Guimont currently has a staff of 160. They are hired by executives of the organization, not the board of directors, he said.

Sougavinski said the Miriam Home will be sure to screen out all applicants, including occasional workers, with a history of sexual or violent convictions. The mechanics of running criminal checks is not that simple though. Applicants, for example, may have records in other provinces or countries.

"It is getting easier though, compared to 10 years ago ... because there are private companies that can do the investigations," he said.

In the meantime, Sougavinski said he and the head of Guimont have called all parents to try to reassure them.

Parents contacted by The CJN were disturbed by the news. "A rapist should not be working with vulnerable people. They can't look after themselves, they can't talk and say what happened to them," said Bernard Bratz, who has a 38-year-old daughter at Guimont.

He said he was surprised to learn that criminal checks were not standard before hiring staff. In fact, he thinks those already on staff should be screened.

Rose Bloom, the mother of a 42-year-old woman at Guimont, said all institutions working with a vulnerable, dependent clientele, such as the handicapped or the elderly, should look into their employees' pasts.

"We hear a lot about human rights, but what about the rights of clients? They have to be protected, too," she said. "Police checks should be standard procedure. I had no idea they did not do so. It's unfortunate it takes an incident like this to change the system." Her daughter had been at Guimont 30 years.

A one-month probation is not protection, she said. "A lot of harm can be done in that time."

Another parent, Harold Bell, who is president of the users' committee and also sits on the Miriam board as a vice-president, noted that it should not be forgotten that "Guimont is one of the finest residences in the system... It's a tremendously good place. It's unfortunate it's had this publicity."

New drugs to help with treatment of dementia

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO - A host of new drugs on the horizon for treatment of some types of dementia is good reason for optimism, said Dr. Morris Freedman. Freedman, a behavioural neurologist and a senior scientist at Rotman Research Institute, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care in Toronto, said although only one drug (donepezil) is approved for this purpose so far in Canada, there are others on the way.

Since treatment by drugs is now possible, it is more important than ever for a correct diagnosis to be made. Not all forms of dementia respond to medication in the same way.

Though Alzheimer's disease makes up from 50 to 75 percent of dementia cases, and affects mainly the elderly, other types are getting more attention.

Scientists are looking at vascular dementia which is usually the result of strokes; frontotemporal dementia, which affects younger ages and can cause personality changes; and Lewy Body dementia, which is coming under increased scrutiny, Freedman said.

Referring to the 275 patients a year he sees in his clinic, Freedman said the majority have Alzheimer's disease and only a minority of them are improving with the drug donepezil (aricept).

"Most of my patients with Alzheimer's are on the drug and they are the same after six months, or worse," he said. "Most of them do not benefit."

"It used to be that people would lump all cases of senility together. The public simply didn't have the knowledge and awareness of Alzheimer's disease that it does today," he said.

But new knowledge indicates that from eight to 25 percent of dementia cases are actually frontotemporal. These patients often become rude or begin shoplifting, and experience a loss of normal social restraints.

Frontotemporal dementia and Pick's disease look alike clinically. Whether they are parts of a spectrum of the same disease is not yet known.

Those with frontotemporal dementia are subject to fluctuations in their cognitive abilities. They are impaired at certain times of the day, have hallucinations, and exhibit some symptoms of Parkinson's disease.

Though he does not know the answer to the question of whether Jewish people are more prone to dementia, Freedman said there is no doubt that Jews are not "protected" against it.

As for the hereditary risk, it is only a minority of patients with Alzheimer's disease who have a strong risk of passing the disease to one-in-two of their children.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I'm not "like most people," and I'm glad I'm not, most of the time. Most of my friends love sports and flirt with girls all day, and there's nothing wrong with that if it's what you like, but it just isn't me. Those guys have been playing team sports since they could walk. My only team sports memory is of playing little-league baseball as an outfielder, so bored that I would sit down on the grass and read or just enjoy the outdoors.

Now, however, I have begun thinking, and I begin to see what I have and what I lack. I have many male friends, but I lack that one female friend. People tell me, "Don't worry, you'll find people like you later in life."

At this rate, it seems that I'll be 90 before I find someone. I know, because I've been told too many times and caught a glimmer of it once, that there "must be someone somewhere." Waiting isn't my forte. What should I do?

Puzzled

Dear Puzzled,

Your awareness of the unique qualities that make you different from other teenage boys shows your maturity. It can be very difficult to admit being different from others, and the fact that you can state these facts shows the ability to assess and understand situations.

You must also understand that in life, love comes to people at different times and in different ways. Do not be disappointed with not having a special girl in your life at this stage. The fact that she is not with you now does not mean you will live in loneliness for the rest of your life.

Love can be found in a variety of relationships. Each relationship has different qualities and will therefore affect your life in a different way. The love in a boyfriend-girlfriend situation is not always the love a person needs at all stages of their life. Certain people can only appreciate a partner at a later point in their life, while they have the love of friends at the other times.

If you have caught a glimmer of love once, you will find it again. Unfortunately, waiting is involved. You have to have faith that there is "someone somewhere" and that she too is waiting for that special someone.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 12 in Toronto.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

I often get a lot of questions about commonly used food additives and preservatives. Here are some of your most frequent questions.

Q. What is MSG (monosodium glutamate) and is it safe?

A. The Centre for Science in the Public Interest considers MSG to be generally safe, yet something that certain people should avoid.

MSG is a flavour enhancer. Some people are sensitive to MSG particularly in large amounts and they may suffer headaches, nausea, burning sensations in the upper body, and sometimes more serious asthmatic reactions.

If you are sensitive to MSG, you should also avoid the following foods as they also contain glutamates: natural flavouring, hydrolyzed vegetable (plant) protein and tomatoes.

MSG is a natural product, it is the sodium portion of an amino acid.

Q. I see ascorbic acid listed on many of the juice boxes that I give my children. What is this and is it safe?

A. Ascorbic acid is very simply vitamin C. It is used in products like cereal, cured meats and fruit drinks, as an antioxidant, colour stabilizer and vitamin. It is therefore a safe ingredient.

SINGIN' IN THE SNOW: Last week on Friday, residents of Jerusalem woke up to find nearly 40 centimetres of snow had fallen on the city. Heavy snowfalls occurred in the north and in the hills adjacent to Jerusalem. On the coastal plain torrents of rain flooded through the area. In this photo we see a worshiper at the Western Wall doffing his umbrella in seeming delight with the falling snow. [Israel Sun photo]

Court ruling soon in Maccabi bridge fiasco

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An Israeli court is expected to rule by mid-February on whether there is any criminal liability in the bridge collapse that marred the 15th Maccabiah Games in July 1997, according to Maccabi Canada president Roy Salomon.

Salomon recently spoke to The CJN, following the distribution of a special report prepared by the Maccabi World Union (MWU) on the bridge collapse.

Four athletes from the Maccabi Australia team – Greg Small, Yetty Bennett, Warren Zines and Elizabeth Sawicki – died as a result of the mishap.

The athletes fell into the Yarkon River when a newly constructed bridge collapsed as the Australian and Austrian teams were crossing it on their way into Ramat Gan stadium for the opening ceremonies of the Maccabiah Games.

The ceremonies and the Games went on, but Maccabi Australia was embittered, the families of those killed and injured have launched civil lawsuits, and two senior MWU officials have resigned.

The accident also set in motion a number of inquiries and raised serious questions about the circumstances that led to the bridge collapse.

Almost immediately after the incident, officials from the Maccabi movement assumed full "moral responsibility" for the tragedy. The movement and government of Israel have provided hundreds of thousands of dollars in loans and gifts to families of the victims and to Maccabi Australia, the MWU report states.

But, as is apparent in the report, which is being distributed here by Maccabi Canada, legal responsibility is another matter.

Officials from Maccabi Canada, including president Roy Salomon, who is a member of the MWU executive, say there has been an unwarranted but definite rush to judgment of the MWU

Stockholm conference declaration

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada has "wholeheartedly" endorsed a landmark eight-point declaration issued at the end of last week's international conference in Stockholm on Holocaust education, remembrance and research.

The Canadian delegation, led by Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray and co-chaired by Montreal MP and human rights activist Irwin Cotler, also noted Canada's initiatives in combating hate and remembering the Holocaust through educational curricula and public memorials.

The 2½-day conference drew experts from 46 countries.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Bishops Support Funding

TORONTO — Ontario's Catholic bishops have thrown their support behind a new coalition seeking full government funding of religious-based schools. In a letter to the Coalition for Justice in Education Funding, which includes Canadian Jewish Congress, Tom Reilly, general secretary to the Ontario Conference of Catholic Bishops, said that they have always favoured state support of faith-based schools, even as Catholics struggled to win full funding for separate schools.

Kosher Deli on Way

VICTORIA — This city's first kosher grocery and New York-style delicatessen is scheduled to open in April. The project is the brainchild of local entrepreneur Rob Thompson, who has lived on Vancouver Island since 1994. Thompson envisions a one-stop kosher market and deli on one of two downtown streets. He's also setting up a web site that will explain the laws of kashrut and will allow customers to buy Judaica and kosher food online.

ISRAEL

Divorce Rate is 33%

JERUSALEM — The divorce rate in Israel now stands at about one out of every three couples, rabbinical court officials said last week. Court director Rabbi El Ben-Dahan said some 30,000 couples married in Israel in 1999, while 8,604 of them divorced. As in previous years, the greatest number of divorces, 3,016, were granted in Tel Aviv, compared with 2,494 the previous year.

Cell Phone Use

JERUSALEM — Israel ranks ahead of the United States and Britain in the use of cellular telephones, as well as personal computers, according to a study by the New York-based Global TGI market research company. Of the 11 countries included in the survey, Israel placed first for cellular phone use, with 61 percent of respondents owning them, compared with 39 percent in the United States. Britain ranked fourth, with 23 percent, while Russia placed last, with only one percent of the population owning cellular phones.

Rebbe Remembered

TEL AVIV — Some 10,000 members of the Chabad Lubavitch movement gathered Jan. 18 at a Tel Aviv stadium to mark the 50th anniversary of the late Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson becoming the movement's leader. The anniversary also commemorates the death of Schneerson's predecessor, his father-in-law, Rebbe Yosef Yitzhak Schneerson.

WORLD

Restitution for Jews

AMSTERDAM — The Netherlands should pay some $114 million to the nation's Jews for the restitution of property looted during the Holocaust era, a state-appointed commission on Jewish assets has recommended. The recommendation came after a panel spent three years researching the treatment of Jewish assets before and after the war.

Swedes to Contribute

STOCKHOLM — A Swedish firm said it would contribute to a German $5.2 billion compensation fund for Holocaust-era slave labourers. SKF, the world's largest manufacturer of ball bearings, said it was making the contribution because it had factories in Nazi Germany that used slave labour.

Slaves' Claims Rejected

BERLIN — A German court dismissed a lawsuit brought by two former Holocaust-era slave labourers, ruling that the statute of limitations had expired. Two Danes had brought the suit against auto parts manufacturer Robert Bosch, seeking $20,000 apiece for having worked 12 hours a day for the firm between 1944 and 1945.

Nazi Dies

LONDON — A Nazi concentration camp officer and suspected war criminal died in a British hospital Jan. 24. Alexander Schweidler, alleged to have committed atrocities while a member of the SS Death's Head Battalion at Mauthausen in Austria, died after collapsing with chest pains. Several groups had lobbied for his prosecution only days before his death.

Holocaust Denial

NEW YORK — Claims that the Holocaust never happened have failed to gain wide acceptance, says a survey of 11 countries conducted by the American Jewish Committee. The survey, released last week before the start of an international Holocaust education conference in Stockholm, found that the largest proportion of deniers live in eastern Germany, where 10 percent of those surveyed held the belief. The survey also found that seven percent of British respondents, five percent of French and one percent of Americans also believe it is possible that the Holocaust never took place.

Leader Found Murdered

MOSCOW — The leader of Moscow's community of Caucasian Mountain Jews was found murdered in his apartment, police said last Thursday. Police discovered the body of Rachamim Yuchananov, 68, saying the murder had probably taken place two days earlier. They added that Yuchananov had suffered severe head injuries and knife wounds, and that a knife with a broken handle was found nearby.

Supreme Court Rejects Spanking of Children

JERUSALEM — Israel's Supreme Court has ruled that parents may not use physical force to discipline or educate their children.

Judge Dorit Beinisch said "permission for moderate violence is likely to spiral into severe violence."

The lone dissenter on the three-judge panel said spanking doesn't fit the legal definition of abuse.

But the other judges said parents who hit their children may be prosecuted even if the child is not injured.

They rejected an appeal by a woman who was convicted of beating her daughter with a vacuum cleaner and punching her son so hard that he broke a tooth. The children are ages five and seven.

Judge Beinisch said even though not all of the woman's beatings could be defined as cruel, there was an atmosphere of terror in the house.

Ottawa may seek more time to remedy UN ruling

Canada faces Feb. 3 deadline on school funding issue

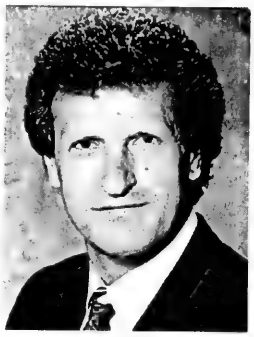
By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The federal government may ask the United Nations for more time to propose a remedy to the UN finding that Ontario discriminates by funding Catholic schools and not private, faith-based schools, says a Toronto Liberal MP.

In its historic November ruling, the UN's human rights committee gave Canada until Feb. 3 to say how it will fix the problem. It's possible federal officials will want a time extension, possibly 30 days, Joe Volpe, MP for Eglinton-Lawrence, told a packed town hall meeting last week.

It is the federal government that must respond, even though education is solely a provincial matter, Volpe explained.

Alternatively, Ottawa could propose some "palatable" solutions, such as directly funding "certain components" of private, religious schools in Ontario; or, increasing tax deductions for tuitions, Volpe said.



Joe Volpe

Addressing a mainly Orthodox audience at Beth Jacob School for Girls, Volpe, who favours funding for independent schools, said he believes Ontario Education Minister Janet Ecker's steadfast refusal to fund private, religious schools, despite the UN decision, "is a negotiating position. I would do the same thing."

As for the oft-stated charge that funding private schools would cost $300 million a year, Volpe said the figure "sounds like a lot, but it's not as much as it would take to keep a couple of NHL teams in operation," referring to Ottawa's professional hockey team subsidy debacle.

He also expressed doubt about the figure, and about the fact that it is expressed as two percent of Ontario's annual $13.5 billion education budget.

"It's probably too high. It's probably closer to one percent because the infrastructures are already in place."

It's hard for Ontario to plead poverty, he said, in view of the fact that last year, the federal government boosted transfer payments to the province by $1.4 billion, and added an extra $400 million in annual equalization payments for the following five years. So even if funding religious schools costs two percent of the education budget, "it won't break the bank," Volpe said to applause.

Volpe told the crowd: "You have as much right to public dollars as your next-door neighbour."

The MP was joined on a panel by Arieh Waldman, the Toronto Jewish parent who took the funding case to the UN. He took the audience through the long process that led to last November's finding.

At no time did his case raise the argument of ceasing funding to Catholic separate schools, but rather called on Ontario "to cease the discrimination."

One audience member noted that if all 40,000 children in religious-based schools were to transfer to the public system at once, the government would have no choice but to absorb the cost.

In other developments, representatives of the newly formed Coalition for Justice in Educational Funding, which includes Canadian Jewish Congress, met last Thursday with members of the Greater Toronto Area Liberal caucus to discuss avenues open to Canada in its response to the UN.

On Saturday, Feb. 5, at 8 p.m., Ontario Parents for Equality in Educational Funding will present a multi-faith rally to mark the federal response. Speakers will include Toni Silberman, chair of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights (Ontario region) and Anne Bayefsky, the lawyer who argued Waldman's case.

The rally will take place at the Hollywood Princess Conference Centre, 2800 Highway 7 in Concord.

Toronto rabbi finds homeless Israeli

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Michael Dolgin, spiritual leader of Temple Sinai, feels it was bashert that he helped out on the Native Men's Residence (Na Me Res) Street Help van, one night last spring.

"It was a night much more significant than I could ever imagine," said Rabbi Dolgin, who was volunteering along with other temple members. Three or four temple volunteers now help staff the van Monday evenings throughout the winter, distributing food, clothing and sleeping bags to people living on the streets. They are assisted by a driver from Na Me Res, who himself has lived on the street.

While on Queen Street West, Rabbi Dolgin said, a homeless man tapped him on the shoulder. "He had noticed my kippah, and he took a kippah out of his own pocket and put it on his head. It

The undefinable heart

For nearly as long as time has been counted, Jerusalem had always been known as the political and spiritual centre of the Jewish people, where King David established the administrative capital of the nation and where his son, King Solomon, established the religious capital – the Temple.

When the Romans sacked Jerusalem, slaughtered and exiled the people, they destroyed the city as the Jewish nation's political centre. When they razed the Temple, toppled its stones and defiled the Holy of Holies, they believed too that they were destroying the city as the Jewish nation's spiritual centre. But they were wrong.

As history, tradition, liturgy and Jewish folklore would prove over the unfolding centuries, regardless of the place of the people's dispersion, Jerusalem in fact was the sustaining flame from which the millennial torch of Return drew its light.

Until near the midpoint of the last century, there was never a debate on the subject – either among the nations of the world, and certainly not among the Jews.

Now, as Israel and the Palestinians are trying to find mutual national accommodation, the future status of Jerusalem could be the fulcrum on which a peace treaty balances.

The Muslim world and certain sectors of the Christian world are opposed to Jewish sovereignty over the city. Though problematic, that opposition is hardly surprising.

Two weeks ago however, as reported in this newspaper, opposition to Jewish sovereignty over Jerusalem emanated from a source that was surprising, namely, from a group of some 300 American rabbis who signed a petition at the initiation of Jerome Segal, president of the Jewish Peace Lobby, urging Israel "to share Jerusalem" with the Palestinians.

With these 300 signatures on the Segal document, the "debate" over Jerusalem has now travelled in a public, high-profile manner, for the first time since the exile at the hands of the Romans, into the Jewish community.

Last week the Rabbinical Assembly (RA), representing 1,500 conservative rabbis and the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), representing some 1,100 Orthodox rabbis, issued a statement reiterating their "previously declared organizational policies that Jerusalem is the united and indivisible capital solely of the State of Israel."

As reported by the JTA, the rabbinical organizations emphasized they view "with great dismay the statement released by 300 unnamed rabbis, which wishes to promote a 'shared Jerusalem.'"

The swift, unequivocal, joint response by the rabbinical authorities is to be commended. Jews must not feel defensive about our "attachment" to Jerusalem; nor should we be reluctant to assert that there are certain compromises that cannot be made. Thankfully, the RA and the RCA made that plain.

A just and secure peace between the Palestinians and Israel cannot and must not include the Jewish abandonment of a restored, reunited Jerusalem.

Some will argue that such a position begs the question of the Palestinian claim to Jerusalem. There are a number of options to explore, however, that respect the Palestinian religious attachment to Jerusalem without impairing the political unity of the city under a sovereign Israel.

For Jews, Jerusalem is more than an item on an agenda, or an issue to be resolved, or the subject of a dispute. It is the undefinable heart of a people, its religion and its history; it is a feeling felt deep in the Jewish soul and psyche – and not only by observant Jews, and not only by the Jews who walk on Jerusalem's streets and not only in the poetry of prayers.

As if to prove the point – not that any proof is necessary – an elegant book was recently published by Vehicule Press in Montreal called Jerusalem: An Anthology of Jewish Canadian Poetry, edited by Seymour Mayne and B. Glen Rotchin.

The anthology commemorated the celebration of the 3000th anniversary, two years ago, of the establishment of Jerusalem by King David as the 'Eternal Capital' of the Jewish people.

As the editors wrote in the preface "Beginning with King David, Jerusalem has enchanted and inspired Jewish poets through the ages... Jewish Canadian poets writing in English have maintained and expressed close ties to Jerusalem in their poems. Over a period of approximately 75 years, these poets have produced a unique body of work about the city, unparalleled in scope and volume in any other English-speaking country."

Among the poets whose poetry Mayne and Rotchin have anthologized are some of the outstanding luminaries of Canadian literature, past and present: A. M. Klein, Leonard Cohen, Miriam Waddington, Irving Layton and Shel Krakofsky. The editors provide a poignant testament to that "undefinable heart" we call Jerusalem and to "how the resonance of Jerusalem continues to inspire Jewish Canadian poets to engage their tradition and identities, and to make the city, as the prophet put it, "A praise in the earth."

I urge readers to acquire this book and to pass it on to any of our kinfolk who appear defensive over the Jewish claim to Jerusalem.

Ontario Court asked to rule if Gypsy, Roma synonymous

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A hate promotion case is hanging by a thread as an Ontario Court judge considers whether Gypsy and Roma are synonymous terms.

Last week, Judge Russell Otter was asked to take judicial notice of the fact that the two terms are interchangeable. Earlier, he had ruled that no evidence had been presented at trial to show Roma and Gypsy were the same.

The case arises out of an August 1997 incident in which seven skinheads paraded in front of the Lido Motel to protest the presence of Roma (Gypsy) refugee claimants. They carried signs that stated: "Honk if you hate Gypsies" and "Canada is not a trash can." They also shouted "Gypsies out" while one demonstrator waved a swastika flag.

They were charged with promoting hatred against an identifiable group, the Roma. One of the seven has already pleaded guilty. The others are four adults – Kryusztof Krymowski, Ryan Marshall, Michael Schulz and Quinn McFarlane – and two young offenders.

Following completion of the prosecution case, Crown attorney Maggie Lazaridis asked Otter to amend the charges to include the term Gypsies, but the judge ruled last week that "there is no evidence to support the conclusion that Roma and Gypsy are the same. To amend the information [charges] as asked by the Crown" would be "prejudicial, unjust and unfair to the defence."

Judicial notice

Lazaridis then asked the court to take judicial notice that the terms Roma and Gypsy are synonymous. Judges are allowed to take judicial notice of facts that are widely accepted and that require no proof. Lazaridis presented the court with several dictionary definitions that showed Roma were described in most cases as male Gypsies.

The Crown's case may well depend on the judge's decision on the issue. The defence contends that the Crown has failed to prove its case based on the charges it has already filed. Defence lawyers Peter Lindsay and David Gomes also contested the Crown's judicial notice application. Lindsay argued that it was too late in the proceedings for the Crown to try to address a "gap" in its case by asking the judge to take judicial notice.

He also argued that the court should not take judicial notice of a key element that is at issue.

If the judge rules that he cannot take judicial notice that Roma and Gypsies are the same, Lazaridis said she will ask that the case be reopened to allow for further evidence on that issue.

Last week, court convened almost 45 minutes late as participants waited for police to deliver McFarlane. McFarlane, who was brought into court in handcuffs, is serving jail time for an unrelated assault conviction.

Head covering case goes to Court of Appeal

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Muslim imam, (cleric) barred from a 1993 trial for wearing a religious head covering, was in the Federal Court of Appeal last Thursday, wearing the same white embroidered kufi that triggered a controversy he is still trying to resolve.

Michael Taylor's right to wear the kufi is no longer in question.

His appeal last week, at which Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) had intervener status, sought instead to determine whether the complaint Taylor originally brought to the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) against Justice Arthur Whealy, actually falls into the commission's purview.

A decision by Justices Edgar Sexton, Joseph Robertson and John Evans was pending at press time.

Following the 1993 criminal trial of Dudley Laws, from which Taylor was barred for refusing to remove his kufi, the CHRC refused to investigate Taylor's complaint against Whealy. The commission cited superior court judges' "absolute immunity" from civil suits. Its decision was upheld by the Federal Court.

Whealy, on separate occasions, had Taylor ejected or barred from the courtroom, even after being presented with an affidavit explaining that Taylor wears the kufi for religious reasons.

The incidents left Taylor feeling "disrespected," he said at a press conference at the offices of the African Canadian Legal Clinic two days before the trial. Taylor, a hospital and prison chaplain, said he was happy his case was finally being heard.

During the Laws trial, Whealy established a dress code, declaring that all male head coverings were prohibited with the exception of those which "by their shape, colour and design, are obvious and easily recognizable as signalling to the eye an adherent of a well-established and recognizable race, culture, national or religious community; one of those communities which is clearly within the purview of the charter."

Judges do have the right to take steps they consider necessary to maintain order in the courtroom, said Peter Rosenthal, Taylor's lawyer. He suggested, however, that evidence might support the contention Whealy acted "in bad faith" or out of "improper motives" like bias.

Rosenthal also suggested the CHRC undertake an investigation, and that remedies like sensitivity training or an apology might be in order.

Whealy admitted in a 1994 letter that he had been in error, "accepting as I must the decision of the Court of Appeal [in a ruling overturning Laws' conviction]."

He also expressed regret "if the impression was created that I am insensitive to the rights of minority groups."

The letter was not an apology, argued Rosenthal.

The issue of head coverings unites many faiths in Canada, said Ed Morgan, CJC's lawyer. A human rights commission is the only place one can go for a remedy for discrimination, he said.

Michael Taylor

Richard Kramer of the Federal Department of Justice, disagreed.

Kramer argued that Whealy's rulings were judicial acts (not administrative acts, as had been suggested) and that judicial immunity did in fact apply in this case. He also argued Whealy did not act in bad faith.

"Judges are called to task on a regular basis," said Kramer. "In this highly charged environment, judicial immunity is that much more needed."

Manuel Prutschi, CJC's national director, has not come across a case in which wearing a kippah has been a problem in a courtroom, he told The CJN.

Messianic groups pose new threat, rabbi warns

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The year 2000 threatens to spell "disaster" for Jews the world over because it has unleashed a new, aggressive drive by so-called Hebrew-Christians to convert them, says a leading expert on the activities of messianic groups.

Hebrew-Christians, who profess to be Jewish but who embrace Jesus as their messiah, have been emboldened by the Christian millennium to convert Jews, says Rabbi Tovia Singer, director of Outreach Judaism, a Monsey, N.Y.-based outfit that serves as a counter-missionary force and counsels Jews who have been lured into messianic groups and cults.

In a CJN interview prior to addressing more than 350 people, including several rabbis, at the Village Shul recently, Rabbi Singer said Jews are more vulnerable now than ever to being sucked into Hebrew-Christian and evangelical churches.

First, with North American Jews more assimilated than ever before, their ties and affinities have been weakened. Second, the new millennium has led to a wave of attempts to convert Jews because many Christians who believe in end-time prophesies feel the mass conversion of Jews to Christianity is a necessary precondition to Jesus Christ's second coming, as spelled out in the New Testament, Rabbi Singer says.

Millennial ministering to Jews "has reached a fever pitch. As far as they're concerned, the Jews are holding up the show.

"This has spelled disaster for our people."

The 39-year-old rabbi, who logs thousands of miles a year lecturing and counselling in the United States and Canada, warns that the messianic movement has mushroomed over the past 20 years and is now a huge, well-funded machine.

Rabbi Tovia Singer

Fewer than 14 messianic congregations existed in North America 20 years ago. The number now exceeds 600, with about 130 of those in Canada, he says.

And their combined budgets are in the $300 million range, money spent on advertising, recruiting and slick publications (such as The Messianic Times, delivered to thousands of Jewish homes in Toronto.) The largest and best-known group, Jews for Jesus, last year operated on a $17 million budget, Rabbi Singer notes.

'consumer fraud' blurs lines

The funds, he says, are raised by right-wing, evangelical and born-again Christians in the United States, whose clout is at an all-time high.

How successful have they been in targeting Jews? He estimates that since Jews for Jesus was founded in 1973, more than 200,000 Jews have joined messianic congregations and evangelical organizations.

One of them, the powerful U.S. Southern Baptist Conference, even passed a resolution in 1996 calling on members to specifically evangelize to Jews.

But, Rabbi Singer adds, Jews don't always stay in these groups. Often, they end up in established Protestant churches, mainly Baptist and Pentecostal. "There aren't that many Jews in messianic congregations. The great majority are now in churches. The messianic movement serves as a clearing house."

One consolation is that converted Jews tend to do a poor job at proselytizing. "Jews who have converted are virtually incapable of converting other Jews," Rabbi Singer says. "They were converted by someone who was never Jewish."

Currently, there are more messianic groups in Florida than anywhere else in the United States, meaning Hebrew-Christians are preying on elderly Jews, often in nursing homes.

In the Brighton Beach section of Brooklyn, there are 37 Christian missionary organizations mainly targeting the 80,000 Russian-Jewish emigres who live there, he says.

Messianic groups often target Jews from the former Soviet Union, who arrive with little or no knowledge of Judaism. The paradox, Rabbi Singer says, "is that these Jews, who know nothing about their faith, are being asked to abandon it."

Christian missionaries target vulnerable Jews, he explains, "either the very young or very old." College campuses are "the most fertile ground for evangelizing. Kids are gone from home, often for the first time in their lives."

Rabbi Singer confesses an admiration for Toronto, which he describes as much more traditional and committed to Judaism than most U.S. cities. But, he concedes, that hasn't stopped local messianic groups such as Chosen People Ministries, City of David and several small congregations from attracting new converts.

He showed The CJN a hard-to-obtain "Messianic Soul-Winner's Card," an index card filled with tips for the Christian recruiter on how to win over Jews.

The card advises not to say "Jesus Christ," but rather, "Messiah Yeshua;" not to use the term "convert," but "completed Jew" or "fulfilled Jew;" not "Christian," but a "Bible believer;" not "come to church," but "come to a meeting of Bible believers;" and not "cross," but rather "tree" or "execution stake."

Jewish communities "should be deeply offended" that Christians are targeting Jews, Rabbi Singer said, and also by what he calls "consumer fraud" – the blurring of lines between Judaism and Christianity with the appropriation by messianics of Jewish symbols, such as kippot, Israeli flags, and menorahs.

The key to these groups' approach is that one does not have to give up being Jewish by believing in Jesus.

What's the answer?

"Jewish education is key," Rabbi Singer says, "both formal and in the home. Bring Shabbat home. You don't have to leave it at synagogue. Young people crave spirituality.

"It's preventive education. I could save a lot more souls through prevention than by extracting them [from messianic groups] later."

Jewish camps also work well, he says. "Remember: Once they go off to college, it's too late."

Jews must realize this is a serious threat: "The success of Jews for Jesus represents the unpaid bills of the Jewish people."

Rabbi Singer is scheduled to make a return appearance in Toronto on Sunday, March 5, 7:30 p.m. at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

A busy week

Last week was a busy one on the political scene in Canada. In Quebec City the Bloc Québécois held its biennial convention. In Toronto, the Mike Harris government advised visiting federal intergovernmental minister, Stephane Dion, that it would "remain silent" on the Clarity Act. And in Ottawa, Conservative party leader, Joe Clark, declared that his party would introduce amendments to the Clarity Act, but still, even with the amendments, might vote against it.

All three events deserve our attention.

In Quebec City, Joseph Facal, Quebec's minister of intergovernmental affairs told the Bloc supporters that his Parti Québécois (PQ) government was considering the possibility of appealing the federal government's Clarity Act to the United Nations. Facal did not elaborate upon the grounds on which such an appeal would be based; we can only presume they would fall within the generalized criticism levelled by the PQ against the federal government that the act is "anti-democratic," that it impinges on the intrinsic democratic rights of the people of Quebec.

But as this newspaper has pointed out frequently, the PQ has a unique notion of democracy. It excludes the rule of law.

How can there not be rules for the dismemberment of a sovereign member of the United Nations? Or, phrased another way, is it reasonable, let alone fair, that the rules for the dismemberment of a sovereign country are to be set only by the party seeking the dismemberment? It would be an interesting appeal, indeed.

Given the implications, for all Canadians and for Quebecers wishing to remain Canadian, of the unilateral separation process advocated by the PQ, the decision by the Harris government to "remain silent" on the Clarity Act is deeply disappointing. It has been a hallmark of every previous Ontario government to champion federalism, publicly, boldly, with enthusiasm, with pride and with deference and sensitivity to the understandable concerns and worries of Quebecers regarding their language, their culture and their history. Inasmuch as the Clarity Act codifies the Supreme Court's reference on the legality of a unilateral declaration of separation by Quebec, it is puzzling that Harris should prefer silence to a statement that affirms the applicability of the rule of law to any attempt that would tear apart the country of which Ontario is at the geographic centre.

Puzzling too is the latest wrinkle in the scrunched-up position of the federal Conservative party on the Clarity Act. Clark, the party's leader, appears about to add to the considerable confusion engendered by his party on the Clarity Act. He will propose amendments to the bill that deal with the reform of the constitution. But his strategy ignores two important factors: (1) The Clarity Act is not about reopening discussion on constitutional amendment. It is, simply, about the rules that would necessarily precede the negotiation of the break-up of the country. (2) The separatists in any event, are not interested in a reconfigured federalism. They are interested in separation.

Not to be ignored also over the weekend, the Reform party appears to have begun the process of metamorphosing into a new right-wing party called the Canadian Conservative Reform Alliance. On this development, we will perforce comment later.

When you visit Vancouver

As a former Vancouverite, I enjoyed Neila Sherman's article referring to many of Vancouver's scenic attractions. I would advise your readers to by-pass the Capilano swinging bridge, with its crowds, crass commercialism, the almost dry river bed below the bridge (the water is reduced to a trickle by the Cleveland Dam), the $9.95 admission fee per person, and instead drive further east to the Lynn Valley swinging bridge. No crowds, stunning scenery, the thundering sound of cascading water below the bridge, exquisite forest hiking and guess what? It's free!

OAJS represents day schools

"Poll Finds 54 percent Support for Religious School Funding" (CJN, Jan. 20) states that a group of Jewish parents "are about to form the Ontario Alliance of Jewish Schools as 'the true representative organization' to work for fair funding, and to be the liaison between the government and Jewish schools."

In fact, the schools themselves formed the Ontario Alliance of Jewish Schools (OAJS), with the support of the professionals that operate them and the lay leadership who sit on their boards. OAJS is the only organization of its type in Ontario. Its members are the Jewish day schools from across the province and it is an independent organization of, for and by the schools. OAJS will indeed work for fair funding, and will function as the liaison between the government and its member Jewish schools across the province. It will work closely with the established communal organizations.

OAJS has already been invited to represent the Jewish Day schools in discussions with the provincial government on the matter of health funding.

This exciting development empowers our schools and by extension, our parents and children, to ensure that the needs of each member school are met when government negotiations begin. In addition, it offers a platform for our schools across the province to communicate their common concerns to one another, regardless of philosophy.

Baskin's review unfair to Poles

Re: Book review by Bernard Baskin (CJN, Jan. 13) of Witness to Hope by George Weigel. A few facts need to be clarified. Had Baskin read the above-mentioned biography attentively, he would have learned that in 1942, the Pope was not a parish priest in Krakow. He was only ordained on Nov. 1, 1946.

In the author's conversation with Pope John Paul II, Dec. 16, 1998 (see notes to pages 81-90), the Pope stated that the Hillers' story is "a legend" (declining to baptize an orphaned Jewish child being cared for by Christian foster parents), adding that "I simply don't remember doing it." The Pope did not suggest, however, that such a decision would have been out of character for him. Indeed, it would have been entirely in character. "But I cannot remember such an incident," he concluded.

To suggest, as Baskin does, that "this was an act of fairness and humanity and probably uncommon in a country like Poland, where hatred of Jews was fierce" is outrageous and offensive to the Pope as well as to those hundreds of Polish priests and nuns who risked their lives (and in some cases died) to save Jewish children (see, for example, Your Life is Worth Mine: How Polish Nuns Saved Hundreds of Jewish children in German-occupied Poland, 1939-1945, by Ewa Kurek). In all cases, the Jewish children sheltered by the clergy and various religious communities were returned after the war.

Other statements made by Baskin are simplistic and irresponsible, if not manifesting downright lack of knowledge of what has been accomplished in the last 30 years in terms of dialogue between Jews and Catholics, and in particular the extraordinary contribution to this dialogue by the Polish Pope.

An important contribution to constructive Catholic-Jewish relations is mutual respect.

Internet trips up Irving

The libel case currently being heard in the English courts of David Irving vs. Deborah Lipstadt and Penguin Books promises to have repercussions far beyond the question of Irving's integrity as a right-wing historical writer (CJN, Jan. 20). If the judge finds in favour of the defendants, at the very least, Nazi sympathizers and Holocaust deniers will receive a serious setback in their ongoing malevolent campaigns.

It has been reported that both parties have spent two years collecting evidence in preparation for the case. We are in the Internet age, and my research indicates that there is sufficient "original" information on the Web for most of us to form a pretty well-informed view of what actually happened in those dark, desperate days, without having to rely on Irving.

Historians should ask vets

Re: New Historians (CJN, Dec. 16, Jan. 13). If Bernard Katz and other "new historians" would like some firsthand information about the "pouring in" of weaponry before June 1948, I urge them to consult the surviving veterans of Israel's War of Independence at any one of the Wingate lodges throughout Canada. They have vivid memories of this particular logistical problem.

And the "new historians" need look no further than the current heart of madness into which the Islamic world has descended; whose spillover now threatens the hitherto comfortable, unmolested daily lives of North Americans.

Does any one remember Buenos Aires, 1992 and 1994?

In search of the legendary Golem

By BRAM D. EISENTHAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The stately Charles Bridge in Prague transports travellers into old Jewish Town here. It's a kind of a time portal, built in 1357 by King Charles IV, and it's lined with 30 magnificent baroque statues.

The controversy over whether a creature once lived on the other side of this Gothic bridge makes the journey even more mysterious.

In the late 1500s, Prague's Rabbi Judah Loew (1520-1609), one of the most respected and beloved sages in eastern Europe, is said to have built a man of clay, which he called the Golem.

The Jews of ancient Prague had a foothold in this city for 600 years by then, arriving as merchants in the 10th century. By the 1300s, though, the burgeoning community was confined to the walled Jewish Town.

Although Prague's Jews were treated better by the local aristocracy than were most Jews in Europe, attacks were still commonplace. In the infamous Easter massacre of 1389, 3,000 Jewish men, women and children were cornered in an alleyway and slaughtered.

Fearing for the safety of his community, Rabbi Loew, also known as the Maharal, practiced Kabbalah – the Jewish mystical tradition – to breathe life into his clay creature. This protector would be summoned when needed, while otherwise labouring in the Alt Neu – Old New – Synagogue during off-hours.

Unfortunately, after performing some heroic feats of rescue, the Golem became infused with ego, disobeying its creator. Rabbi Loew managed to trick the Golem and cause its life force to disperse.

The legend goes on to say that the Golem's body has been kept in the attic of the synagogue ever since.

But did the Golem actually exist?

"Many do come to Prague attracted by the legends, especially many chassidic Jews," said Leo Pavlat, the director of Prague's Jewish Museum. "Twice I was woken in the middle of the night when some people called, asking that I take them to the roof of the Alt Neu shul to see the Golem. I managed to convince them that he didn't exist."

Rabbi Moishe New

Pavlat scoffed when told that many consider the Golem to have been a living, breathing thing. He also said that Rabbi Loew was not a kabbalist.

"There is no actual link" between the "rabbi and Kabbalah," he said.

These denials provoked a pointed response from Rabbi Moishe New, director of the Montreal Torah Centre. The rabbi is a noted authority on Kabbalah, giving lectures and teaching classes on the subject to beginners and veterans alike.

"The Talmud recalls instances where sages fashioned Golems for the protection of Jewish lives, much as the Maharal did," New said.

"The body of the Golem was infused with a soul, becoming a type of angel enclosed in a manmade body. Angels are considered to be like creatures or animals in daily Jewish prayer. They have no free choice and are not capable of making moral decisions – they are spiritual robots, subservient to their makers."

The Maharal, New also stressed, certainly did practice Kabbalah.

"He was an outstanding kabbalist, philosopher and talmudist and wrote an entire series of books, 20 in all, based on Kabbalah. They were called Gevurot Hashem or the Might of God. Rabbi Loew's genius was that he expressed kabbalistic teachings in a rational manner, thus making it accessible to the masses.

"As a matter of fact, the chassidic movement owes its inception, to a significant degree, to his teachings."

Grave dated 1697 in the old Prague cemetery.

But what of the existence of the Golem of legend? The tale was certainly inspirational enough to cause German Czech journalist Franz Klutschak, in 1838, to write a story titled The Golem and Rabbi Loew, for a popular periodical, Panorama des Universums.

In 1847, the Galerie der Sippurim, published by Prague bookseller Wolf Pascheles, mentions Loew's Golem amongst its many fairy tales about famous Jews. A 1915 bestseller by Vienna-born Gustav Meyrink featured the Golem as well.

Even Nobel laureate Isaac Bashevis Singer got into the act, publishing his English version of The Golem in 1982. He had written the Yiddish original for the Jewish daily Forward in 1969, with his Prague protagonist a kabbalist named Rabbi Leib.

The motion picture world also got into the act with two German silent movies, a 1914 version co-directed by the film's star and co-producer, Paul Wegener, followed by another in 1920, also featuring Wegener.

Visiting Prague, it's easy to get caught up in the legend, with two sites of interest to Golem-seekers.

The unforgettably bleak, yet thrilling landscape of the Old Jewish Cemetery in Jewish Town is a Kafkaesque arrangement of over 12,000 stones dating back to the 15th century. Bodies are buried vertically in rows of 12, as Jews were not allowed to inter their dead anyplace else. Many stones are tilted, pointing like jagged shards of glass.

While many of the city's renowned leaders are buried here, the prize is the grave of the Maharal himself. It is probably the most visited Jewish site in Prague, and like Jerusalem's Western Wall, is filled with notes of prayer and hope thrust into every nook and cranny.

Then there is the nearby Alt Neu Synagogue itself. Dating to 1280, it is the oldest Jewish house of worship in Europe and one of Prague's oldest Gothic buildings. Services have been held continuously for over 700 years, with the exception of the World War II years.

Worshippers can gaze at the vaulted ceiling, wondering whether the Golem is in the attic, as purported.

"Certainly, the Golem's existence was witnessed by the people of that time and forms part of the oral history of the Jewish people," said Rabbi New.

As to where its body lies, the rabbi sticks to the legend.

"It is in the attic of the Alt Neu Synagogue, under piles of weathered old holy books. The body may be crumbled by now, but that is the tradition."

As to why community leaders like Pavlat continue to deny the Golem's existence, Rabbi New can only offer an educated guess.

"The Maharal would not have wished it to be venerated, and it has therefore been kept a guarded secret over the centuries. That is probably the motive for not showing the body."

Paul Wegener as he appeared in the 1920 epic film The Golem.

Payments for forced labour

More than 50 years after thousands of Jews and other prisoners were hired out by the Nazi government to various industrial concerns, the question of their compensation has become a hot topic both in Germany and wherever former victims or their heirs live.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

There have been debates over defining which business enterprises today would be deemed responsible for past deeds and how much compensation ought to be paid.

Therefore, it is not surprising that I found a survey of German newspapers dealing with the issue most interesting. It was published by the official German Information Agency. One should keep in mind that the contribution of various German industrial concerns is voluntary and not as yet demanded by law.

The Handelsblatt, Duesseldorf: "We cannot understand that the number of concerns that have offered to participate in this compensation process is so small. To employ forced labour was part of taking part in Nazi activities. There were few Oskar Schindlers in the German economy of the day."

Schwarzwaelder Bote, Oberndorf: "Some people still maintain the myth that forced labour was an obligation that German industrial businesses of the day had to obey. That may have been the case in a few instances but not in the majority of German industries. The former chancellor, Helmut Kohl, entered the discussion only because the Americans forced him to do so."

These are just two examples of the kind of reaction that can be found in the German press, and meanwhile, the negotiations have gone forward at this writing (in late November). The payments at issue amount to about $7 billion (Cdn), to which the German federal government would contribute $3 billion and the business concerns, the rest.

At this writing, some 52 big business concerns have agreed to participate. The president of Germany, Johannes Rau, has said that he hopes the negotiations over the compensation will be finished in the near future.

The Fuldaer Zeitung writes: "Unfortunately, the interest of various German enterprises depends on where they operate. DaimlerChrysler, Bayer, or Deutsche Bank will comply quite readily because they have North American branches. Otherwise, they would be exposed to advertisements that would ruin their prospects."

These are some excerpts from the kind of discussions going on about a problem that should have found a solution a very long time ago. Compensation for forced labour is very different from what the Swiss banks had offered to needy survivors of the Shoah. (The distribution of those monies were completed some time ago.)

The forced labour issue is of a different kind. Here, the simple issue is the payment that is due to specific persons for having worked for a company during a particular time, against their will. The monies they were due are due to them or their heirs. It is as simple as that, but when morality is tied to money it seems to have a hard time.

Meanwhile, those enterprises that have come forward and offered to do their part are to be recognized for having done the right thing, and when all is concluded we are entitled to know who they are.

Bye, bye Weizman

The way things have been unfolding here lately, pretty soon you'll need a program to keep track of the political players, the litany of their reported shenanigans, their legal teams and their investigative opponents from the police. Virtually every day, Israel's elected officials seem to suffer more humiliation through new revelations of their alleged criminal wrongdoings.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

If it's not the president, it's the prime minister, or his predecessor and wife or the former justice minister; or an ex-interior minister or any number of current and former Knesset members. And just for good measure from the private sector, the publisher of the country's second largest newspaper is in serious trouble with the law.

Corruption is not new to Israeli politics but never before has it appeared so rampant at such a senior level. Take a one-week period in late January as an example when tales of miscreant politicians were all over the headlines.

Sunday: The special police team, investigating the huge cash gifts given President Ezer Weizman by a French millionaire, began reviewing material on the case handed over by State Attorney Edna Arbel.

Monday: At the trial of Shimon Sheves, the director-general of the Prime Minister's Office under Yitzhak Rabin from '92 to '95, prosecutors presented evidence that Sheves took large bribes for favours for building contractors; the lawyer of former interior minister and former Shas leader, Aryeh Deri, who last spring was sentenced to four years in prison for the acceptance of a bribe, breach of trust and aggravated fraud, asked the Supreme Court to delay hearings on Deri's appeal.

Tuesday: Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein decided to file a criminal indictment against Knesset member and former justice minister, Tzahi Hanegbi, on charges of fraud, breach of trust, falsification of corporate documents and possibly bribery; former Knesset member, Pessah Grupper, was accused in a Jerusalem court of receiving a bribe for acting as an "adviser" to the Dubek tobacco company while opposing anti-cigarette legislation in the Knesset.

Wednesday: State comptroller, Eliezer Goldberg – using the powers of a commission of inquiry – questioned Prime Minister Ehud Barak about allegations that non-profit groups funnelled millions of dollars into illegal contributions to his '99 election campaign.

Thursday: Citing new incriminating evidence, Attorney General Rubinstein ordered police and tax authorities to upgrade their probe of President Weizman's gift-taking to a full-scale criminal investigation.

Friday: Justice Minister Yossi Beilin joined a growing number of public officials calling on Weizman to take a leave of absence from the presidency, if not resign, pending results of the police investigation.

An extraordinary week? Perhaps, but not by much, given the epidemic of graft and impropriety linked to politicians and other prominent members of Israeli society in recent years.

Nobody could be more delighted than the media – both local reporters and foreign correspondents – who thrive on scandal mongering. This is how one Jerusalem-based journalist summarized things in a recent article for the Associated Press wire service.

"The president has admitted pocketing wads of cash from a rich admirer. An ex-prime minister is under suspicion that he snatched the silverware and other valuables from his official residence. A former justice minister faces a fraud indictment. And a one-time interior minister is headed for jail on a bribery conviction."

Admittedly, corruption seems endemic to public life in most countries. Too many politicians act as if the normal rules of decency don't apply to them, using their power for direct personal interest while forgetting their pact of trust with the public. No surprise then that politicians generally are held in low esteem.

Adding to the distaste is the tendency of many Israeli politicians to shrug off any sense of accountability, even in the most flagrant cases of abuse of their office or dereliction of duty. Sure enough, (as of this writing) almost a month into the scandal engulfing his presidency, Ezer Weizman desperately clings to his post, defiantly rejecting all calls to step aside, at least until the police complete their investigation.

Sadly, Weizman refuses to face the reality that having demonstrated major ethical lapses, he no longer commands the moral authority to effectively represent the state. Weizman may not have broken the law, but in secretly accepting several hundred thousand dollars in gifts from a mysterious foreign businessman (which Wiezman admits), and then withholding vital information from the attorney general and state attorney, he disqualified himself from remaining in office. Whether or not Weizman was on the take, he owes it to the country to step down immediately. From its head of state, Israel deserves – and must demand – better.

A sense of shame

The number of corruption investigations, trials, and convictions involving high-level Israeli officials qualifies as a plague. The latest case involves President Weizman, who received large sums of money from a French businessman. Weizman apparently did not pay income tax or report these transactions, and is suspected of providing favours and using his political influence as a minister after the 1977 elections on behalf of his benefactor.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The list of current and former officials and prominent personalities involved in similar investigations and trials is already quite long. The phenomenon crosses party lines and ideologies, and is deeply rooted in Israeli society.

The wave of new cases does not mean that this phenomena is recent, and that Israeli society is becoming more corrupt. Rather, it shows that for the first time, the problem is being taken seriously.

Elite corruption is, in large part, a heritage of the political culture inherent in the socialist ideology that dominated Israeli society for decades. In this framework, the lines that separated government, political party, and individual were blurred. Many ministers and officials received side-payments from contractors, using the funds to support the institutions and activities of their political parties. Since the party, like the government, ostensibly served the public interest, they claimed that no moral violation was involved.

Once the line between government and party disappeared, the distinction between "private" and "public" was also lost. Since private property was frowned upon (and in the kibbutz movement, banned), everything was "public." This allowed a few members of the elite to use public funds for what was in fact, if not de jure, private enrichment. While some individuals were content with, and took pride in, maintaining the Spartan existence of the early Zionist period, others sought the perks and lifestyles that they deemed appropriate for their positions and public contributions. In the former Soviet Union, where all comrades were equal, the same process took place, but on a much grander scale.

At the same time, during its early years, Israel had many of the negative characteristics of a Third World society. For many immigrants, even a Jewish government was seen as the enemy, rather than the source for implementing common objectives. With taxes very high, and enforcement of tax laws weak (police and inspectors could often be bribed), owners of small businesses and corner grocery stores learned to cheat the system.

Plumbers and electricians gave discounts for cash payments, which allowed them to avoid taxes and left no paper trail. Taxi drivers are required, by law, to use meters for all trips, but customers are often told that the "meter is broken" or offered "special fares" without the meter.

In these situations, corruption spreads like a disease. Soon after their arrival, new immigrants seeking a government mortgage learned that they were expected to pay a bribe to inspectors sent to measure the apartment, so that they would report the size required to qualify for assistance. When immigrants opened their own businesses, it was difficult to avoid the temptation to follow the prevailing pattern of corruption.

When such practice is widespread, the police and courts cannot cope with the number of violations of the law. The legal system loses both its deterrent value and its moral authority, and there is no sense of shame or wrongdoing. It is difficult to justify prosecution of individuals, particularly in the lower-income levels of society, when corruption is considered a norm.

However, as Israel has matured, this situation began to change. The wave of prosecutions of high-level officials and members of the elite, including President Weizman, marks a fundamental shift in national values. This sends a signal to the rest of the society that such behaviour is no longer acceptable.

The well-connected individuals, such as Ofer Nimrodi, can no longer bribe their way out of a difficult situation. A new generation of professionals in the State Prosecutors Office, led by Attorney General Elyakim Rubenstein, are no longer subject to the control of political patrons.

Politicians, ministers and even the president have been put on notice; the corruption that had been widespread in the past is no longer acceptable.

Israel still has a long way to go to fight corruption. However, the public reaction and sense of shame and national embarrassment demonstrate that basic Jewish values have not been entirely lost. Israel is still far from becoming a "light unto the nations" but the ethical spark from the Prophets continues to glow.

The Kirshner File

Israeli filmmaker saved Eichmann trial footage

The trial of Nazi criminal Adolf Eichmann began on April 11, 1961 and ended eight months later when he was condemned to death for war crimes. The first trial of its kind in Israel, it was also the only one to be filmed in its entirety. While segments of the 1946 Nuremberg trials were captured on celluloid, the Eichmann trial was unique because a complete cinematic record of the proceedings was preserved for posterity.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

From day one, four video cameras, concealed behind fake partitions so as not to disturb the solemnity of the event, were placed in the Jerusalem courtroom. The 114 hearings, consuming 500 hours, were recorded on video, the first ever shot on this medium outside a television studio. The director was Leo Hurwitz, an American. The producer, Milton Fruchtman, was a Canadian.

At the close of Eichmann's trial, due to copyright problems, the footage was shipped to the United States for storage. It lay there, all but forgotten, for almost two decades. In 1977, it was reclaimed by Israel. The tapes were subsequently acquired by the Steven Spielberg Jewish Film Archives at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. Here they were stored in an unused washroom.

In 1991, while poking around in the archives for footage of the iconoclastic philosopher Yeshayahu Leibovitz, an Israeli filmmaker named Eyal Sivan learned of the Eichmann file.

Sivan was researching a documentary about Leibovitz and the whole notion of civil disobedience in Israel since Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982. A left-wing dissident who opposed that contentious war and has lived in France since 1985, Sivan decided, there and then, that the theoretical concept of total obedience could also be applicable to Eichmann, a functionary who never shirked orders and maintained that he was merely a cog in the genocidal machinery.

Having resolved to make a film about this historic trial, Sivan and an associate, Rony Brauman – a Paris-based physician who was one of the founders of Doctors Without Borders, the recipient of the 1999 Nobel Peace Prize – quickly discovered that immense problems lay ahead. Caught in a catch-22 situation, they were told by the archives that while they could examine the Eichmann videos, they could not use them, since the rights were held by the Israeli government.

Israel, Sivan said in a recent interview, refused to release the tapes, which had been allowed to deteriorate. "The government was unwilling to admit that it had neglected the material."

Frustrated by the delays, Sivan and his partner almost gave up on the project. But on the advice of a lawyer, they petitioned the Israeli Supreme Court. The judges ruled in their favour. They could now restore and remaster the footage.

"We saved it from certain oblivion," said Sivan. "The old videos would have mouldered away."

The documentary they eventually made, The Specialist, screened at the Toronto International Film Festival last September, was the result of painstaking sifting. "We had to keep down the film to two hours," explained Sivan, a 35-year-old former fashion photographer. "This was really hard work."

But in delving into the archives, he discovered that the Eichmann file was incomplete. The tapes had been stocked haphazardly and had not been classified, resulting in the disappearance of videos. And besides, he theorized, original clips had been thoughtlessly sold to journalists and never returned. All in all, 150 hours had vanished, much of the missing footage dealing with witness testimony.

"We have 99 percent of Eichmann's testimony," said Sivan, who describes him as a cold-hearted person who obeyed orders zealously. In The Specialist, which Sivan says was inspired by Hannah Arendt's book, Eichmann in Jerusalem, the accused is portrayed as a bland bureaucrat whose banality is, quite simply, terrifying.

Adolf Eichmann

Sitting in a glass box, watched over by three guards and surrounded by neat piles of documents he reads and leafs through, Eichmann usually rises when he testifies. Speaking in a monotone voice, he concedes that he acquired an expertise in transportation by virtue of having organized the forced emigration of Austrian Jews and the shipment of other European Jews to concentration camps in Poland.

Eichmann, who was present at the 1942 Wannsee conference in Berlin, which devised the Final Solution, claims that he "totally supported" the Jewish quest for a homeland, or, as he called it, "a space." Indeed, he was involved in a high-level 1940 study to determine the feasibility of resettling Jews on the Indian Ocean island of Madagascar. Due to the war, the plan was never implemented.

Earnestly, Eichmann claims that he was an idealist concerning the "Jewish question," implying that he opposed the extermination of Jews. Calling the Holocaust "one of the greatest crimes" in history, as well as "a monstrous act," he acknowledges his complicity in it, but adds that he was merely performing his duty.

Sivan, whose mother's Polish family was murdered by the Germans, does not buy Eichmann's assertion that he would have committed suicide had he been assigned to a death camp. "Bullshit! Eichmann would have obeyed any order. Above all else, he valued loyalty and a job well done."

Sivan accepts at face value Eichmann's statement that he witnessed the gassing process in Auschwitz against his will. "Eichmann didn't like the sight of blood. He was very comfortable sitting in his office in Berlin." Sivan does not hate Eichmann, nor does he believe that he was an ideological anti-Semite. But he fears people, like him, who can compartmentalize their behaviour.

An opponent of capital punishment, Sivan said that Eichmann should have been locked up for the duration of his life rather than executed. "A 99-year sentence would have been more painful. He was obviously guilty."

Sivan, whose parents immigrated to Israel from Uraguay before he was born, contends that the trial served several purposes. It enabled survivors to tell their stories. It awakened the younger generation to the Holocaust. It shocked disaffected Sephardi Jews into the realization that Ashkenazi Jews, the creme de la creme of Israeli society, had undergone great suffering during World War II. And finally, it united a nation fragmented along ethnic lines.

Sivan argues that The Specialist – which cost three million dollars (US) to produce – is a slap in the face of Holocaust deniers. Eichmann's testimony is crystal clear on two pivotal points. The first is that Adolf Hitler personally ordered Reinhard Heydrich, a top-ranking SS official, to draw up plans for the physical destruction of Jews. The second is that Eichmann witnessed gassings in Auschwitz.

Sivan, whose previous films have turned on the Arab-Israeli dispute, said that The Specialist had its premiere in France last March. Since then, it has been shown at festivals in Israel, Australia, Japan and throughout Europe, including Germany (where Eichmann was born) and Austria (where he was raised).

However, he has not succeeded as yet in finding a North American distributor. "Some distributors told us that it isn't emotional enough. Others said that it's too controversial. Why? I really don't know."

Sivan is of the view that The Specialist was instrumental in nudging Israel to release Eichmann's memoirs for future publication. But don't hold your breath, he cautioned. "I expect the book to be boring. Eichmann was dull, intellectually and emotionally."

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Finding the right approach

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

In the last number of years there has been a burgeoning interest in Jewish communities in adult Jewish education. Many men and women, finding that their childhood schooling in Tanach and Talmud was wholly insufficient, have clamoured for a more intellectually sophisticated and emotionally fulfilling version of the desiccated Torah classes of their youth. From home study groups to regular synagogue classes, this return to learning can only be hailed as a positive development.

Yet at the same time, the popularity of such an enterprise raises serious questions about what methods teachers should employ to maintain interest in the material. This is, of course, a conundrum common to all levels of education from preschool onwards.

But it is the particular situation of adults that brings the problem into high relief, for a Torah class must vie with other possibilities in the morning or evening schedule. Sandwiched between taking care of the children or getting the bills in order, and competing with the movies, television and the Internet, adult education finds itself on the horns of a dilemma: to entertain or not to entertain.

Torah today has become something to be marketed and packaged. Nervous about the potentially dry core of essential Jewish texts – much of the Talmud, for instance, seems less than kinetic when compared with say, Plato's Republic, not to mention the self-help fare stuffing your local bookstore.

Jewish institutions increasingly have taken to linking their product with popular sounding slogans, as Erica Brown notes: "This motivation has inspired high gloss brochures and promises of good refreshments after class. One adult education program took an acronym that made it sound like an aerobics class." She goes on to note how many Torah study classes are paired up in a pseudotrendy manner: Zen and Chassidut, or Gestalt theory and the Book of Exodus.

While there may be nothing inherently wrong with broadening the scope of Judaism to show its universality, there is a danger when the underlying message seems to be: "See, Torah can be hip, too – as engaging as Seinfeld, as spiritually healing as Eastern meditation."

In his seminal The Closing of the American Mind, Allan Bloom argues for an approach that stresses the teacher's need to raise the student to a higher level rather than simply appealing to whatever is in fashion: "No real teacher can doubt that his task is to assist his pupil to fulfil human nature against all the deforming forces of convention and prejudice."

Far more than long haired rebellion or café au lait revolution, Judaism at its heart is radically "countercultural." The religion of mitzvot has for over three millennia stubbornly clung to its core values of divine service and the discipline of the moral life. Although several of its practices have evolved in relation to shifting cultural mores – women's education might be one example – its primary thrust has remained a detailed and daily regimen of observances meant to lead to the love of God.

Humour, cultural analogy, animated oratory – these are often the staples of Jewish educators in accommodating the postmodern adult skirmish with the ancient words.

Hopefully such techniques will aid the student towards a higher encounter with Jewish spirituality, rather than constituting an implicit apologetic for Judaism's textual rigour, unabashed opposition to Western entertainments, and demand for mental and emotional commitment.

Teachers must take the harder road towards lifting the student to Sinai rather than running down the mountain with a TV guide in one hand, a New Age manual in the other.

Lobbying for the Golan

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began to look at Golan sites on the Web with an emphasis on history and contemporary news about this critical region. Today, we continue with the passionate lobbying taking place in Israel and then, the view from Syria.

There are quite a few sites devoted to keeping the Golan a part of Israel and therefore opposed to the peace talks with Syria. The most prominent is [http://www.golan.org.il/eindex.htm/]. This large, bilingual site addresses all the major issues such as water rights, tourism, development and of course, security. "The Golan Heights are essential for the security of the State of Israel... and there can be no territorial compromise."

The National Council for the Golan calls itself the leading non-partisan Israeli organization devoted to retaining the Golan Heights under Israel sovereignty [http://www.mygolan.org.il/]. The council includes former Israeli defence minister, Moshe Arens, and former Israeli air force commander, Herzl Bodinger. This colourful site includes a survey of Syrian press and posters which illustrate why the Golan must remain Israeli.

There is an on-line declaration, where visitors can record their opposition to ceding land: "The very notion of uprooting Jewish men, women and children from their homes is an act of brutality, violence and barbarism that is palpably illegal as a violation of fundamental rights of human dignity and liberty." [http://www. gamla.org.il/english/dec.htm]. You can check out links to other sites opposed to peace talks at [http:// www.golan.org.il/vaad/sites.htm].

At the other end of the political spectrum, you will find a site run by Gush Shalom [http://www.webcom.com/gush/gush-shalom/]. Established by former MK Uri Avneri, Gush Shalom believes that all settlements must be dismantled and that "The green line is to be a border of peace between the state of Israel and the state of Palestine."

In a series of essays, Avneri argues that the Golan must be returned to Syria [http://www.webcom.com/gush/gushshalom/archives.html]. "Every single person who settled on the Golan knew that he builds his home on the ruins of a human being living in misery a few dozen miles away. His wonderful 'quality of life' is based on the misery of someone else."

PEACE: A Mideast dialogue group was born in February of 1998, when an Israeli software consultant began an online dialogue with a Jordanian freelance journalist [http://www.ariga.com/peacwatch/pwtoc.htm]. It now counts among its supporters America's Rabbi Arthur Waskow. They argue that the alternative to making peace with Assad is making war with Assad or his successors. "The alternative to giving up the Golan Heights now in return for a peace treaty, may not be keeping them forever, but giving them back under much worse circumstances ten or twenty years hence, when there are many more settlers to move."

PEACE also offers an online petition where you can register your support for the peace process [http://www.ariga.com/peacwatch/deceng.htm]. And for more websites supporting the peace process, see [http://www.ariga. com/linksisraelis.htm].

Next week, looking at Golan sites from north of the border.

Memorable Jewish books

Books
Bernard Baskin

Here is an indisputable fact: A person with a moderate income can afford to buy more books than he or she can read in a lifetime – and, of course, there is always the welcoming public library.

But whether you buy, borrow or "steal" them, what follows is a list of memorable Jewish books of the past year. Naturally, there is an overflowing number of titles and what follows is merely a small selection of possible choices.

Fiction

• The Conversion, by Aharon Appelfeld.
• The Oxford Book of Jewish Stories, edited by Hans Stavans.
• Here I am, Contemporary Jewish Stories From Around the World, edited by M. Berkman and E. Starkman.
• Sulha, by Malka Marom.
• For the Relief of Unbearable Urges, by Nathan Englander.
• A Journey To The End of the Millennium, by A.B. Yehoshua.
• Felix Roth, by Cary Fagan.
• The Sabbathday River, by Jean Hanff Korentz.
• The River Midnight, by Lilian Nattel.
• Katerskill Falls, by Allegra Goodman.

Non-fiction

• The Times of My Life and My Life With the Times, by Max Frankel.
• Kaddish, by Leon Wieseltier.
• Pack of Thieves, How Hitler and Europe Plundered the Jews and Committed the Greatest Theft in History, by Richard Chesnoff.
• Yosi Rakover Talks to God, by Zvi Kolitz.
• In Search of American Jewish Culture, by Stephen Whitfeld.
• These are the Words, A Vocabulary of Jewish Spirituality, by Arthur Green.
• The Jewish Search for a Usable Past, by David G. Roskies.
• Primo Levi, Tragedy of an Optimist, by Myriam Anissimov.
• The Jewish Moral Virtues, by Eugene Borowitz and Francis Schwartz.
• The Great Poems of the Bible, by James Kugel.
• The Holocaust in American Life, by Peter Novick.
• I Will Bear Witness, A Diary of the Nazi Years – Volumes 1 and 2, by Victor Klemperer.

Helping immigrants

By MICHAEL BRIKS

Guest Voice

Canada's Jewish population has grown from 10,000 Jews at the beginning of the 20th century, to over 300,000 today.

Approximately 2,300 Jewish immigrants and refugees have come to this country annually in recent years. While Jewish immigration to Canada has been mostly from the former Soviet Union, there has been a substantial increase from Central and South America.

Within our community, there has been a regrettable shift in perception among second and third-generation Jewish Canadians, who now feel that Jewish newcomers require very little of us. The fact that more and more Jews are entering the country within the Independent/ Skilled category or class of federal immigration regulations fuels a misconception about immigrant needs, and potentially does a great disservice to future Jewish migrants.

This is particularly true where allocation of community dollars is in question. The term "independent/skilled" is not synonymous with "financially well-off, arriving with job offer." Rather, it refers to probability. These newcomers will "probably" not require financial assistance from the state (welfare), at least in the short run; and "probably" will have at least one family member employed sooner rather than later, but with our effort and support!

Immigration to Canada is not cheap. The federal government charges every adult refugee and immigrant $975 for the "right of landing" in Canada. This equates to several months' salary in some places. On top of that, consider Canadian immigration application fees, transportation costs and the like. Statistics bear out that a majority of Jewish immigrant hopefuls to this country are not wealthy, let alone "middle class." They are, however, reasonably educated, and often desperate.

The following letter from a family in Ukraine recently arrived at the national office of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS). It is typical of the situation facing prospective Jewish immigrants to Canada from any number of places in the world. It has been slightly edited to ensure the anonymity of its author.

"Dear Sirs,

We have found about your community in Canada, so first things first. We are a Jewish family living in the eastern Ukraine … I am 30 and I've got a 30-year-old husband. After graduating the medical university, I've been working as a doctor for six years. We have a child, she is 6. This year our daughter will go to school. My husband is electronics engineer, he's got a higher education too.

We're proud of being Jewish family, we've been trying to help the Jewish community here by supplying the medicines to the members of the community…

It's becoming harder and harder to be a representative of Jewish people because… there are so many people who would like to find a person to blame.

It used to be in this country that, if there is something wrong, the Jewish people are always to be blamed and punished, so the same situation is in progress now…

We make enough money to live on, because we are hard working people willing to do something good for community. We've been feeling the pressure from our neighbours, colleagues, because of being Jewish, maybe because of having our own culture and way of doing things on our own. We would like to obtain more information on immigration process to Canada as Jewish immigrants. We'd pay all expenses having to do with preparation, all necessary documents.

We have relatives in Canada, so we think it will not be the problem where to live. We are begging you for help…Waiting for your fast response."

If we truly wish to help Jewish newcomers in the new millennium, we need to embrace three basic ideas: Jews have a right to shape their destinies through migration; immigrants arrive on new shores as people of need; and Jewish immigrants are to be revered because they are our brethren, because humanitarianism cuts deep into our religious and cultural upbringing, and because every Jewish community in this country, without exception, was founded by Jewish immigrants!

Therefore, we must strive to find ways to assure that, regardless of where immigrants choose to settle, they receive all the vital settlement and integration services from suitably trained professionals and community volunteers.

By empowering newcomers to participate in planning committees, task groups and agency boards, we also improve our services to immigrants.

By advancing agency assessment tools, we standardize the assessment process for service providers throughout Jewish communities across the country and we acquire greater insight into immigrant needs.

Ultimately, we assure newcomers that we are trying to help them integrate in the best way we can while distributing our scarce communal dollars as best we can too, with discretion and fairness.

Michael Briks is the executive vice-president of JIAS Canada.

Sephardi congregation to expand its facilities

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The only francophone Jewish congregation in Ontario is planning to expand its facilities.

Magen David Sephardic Congregation has occupied a modest building on McAllister Road near Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue for the past 21 years.

The planned 3,700-square-foot addition, with Moorish arches and a white stucco exterior, will reflect both the congregation's Mediterranean heritage and its current needs. It will extend to the lot immediately west, now occupied by a house owned by the synagogue.

The expansion, designed by Ritchie Bolton Architects, will feature a 2,500-square-foot social hall and a chupah veranda. The current basement social hall, which can accommodate just over 100 people, limits the number of functions that can be held on-site.

"This is one of the many reasons we need this expansion," said congregational president Gad Elmaleh, who has been working on the project for four years.

His dream, he said, is to have the expansion completed so the congregation's children will have it for the future.

Construction is estimated at over $500,000, and is expected to begin once 75 percent of that amount is raised.

Formal fund-raising, which will extend outside the congregation to the greater Jewish community, will commence as soon as possible, said Elmaleh, whose own community involvement extends to other congregations and institutions.

Magen David's newly refurbished sanctuary, with its traditional women's balcony, elegant columns, gilt ark and graceful chandelier, hints at the hoped-for atmosphere of the addition.

The 350-seat sanctuary will remain intact but with the added option of opening the back wall. It is intimate and reminiscent of small communities in Morocco, said Elmaleh.

Although the synagogue has approximately 130 member families, membership does not accurately reflect the number of people the congregation serves, according to Rabbi Yehiel Benayon, Magen David's spiritual leader for the past 14 years.

In addition to the extended families of the members, the congregation also serves Sephardi immigrants from areas of the former Soviet Union such as Kazakhstan and Bukhara. Magen David regularly hosts bar mitzvahs for that community as well as providing an annual Passover seder.

"We help as much as we can," said Elmaleh, a native of Mogador, Morocco, who immigrated to Canada in 1967 from France.

When Moroccan Jews began to settle in Toronto in the 1950s, French and Spanish speakers alike prayed together at the Bloor Y.

As the Moroccan Jewish population grew, new congregations started to form – the GTA now has a Sephardi population of 8,000 and 11 Sephardi congregations.

Magen David originally met in a house on Viewmount Avenue. It was incorporated in 1966 and serves, for the most part, natives of Tangiers, which is the birthplace of Rabbi Benayon as well (he immigrated in 1967 at age nine).

Although a visitor today will hear plenty of French being spoken at Magen David, the synagogue bulletin and the rabbi's sermons are in English – for the benefit of the younger generation, said Elmaleh.

Services are "very spirited" and "very participatory," said Rabbi Benayon. "It's very open to everyone. We try to make everyone welcome."

Sales of Israel Bonds top $100 million mark

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian sales of State of Israel Bonds climbed to record levels in 1999, exceeding the $100 million mark for only the second time in history.

Buoyed by competitive interest rates and an innovative marketing campaign, the bonds attracted 12,000 individual investors, as well as foundations, endowments, pension funds and labour unions.

Canadian sales of Israeli bonds comprised approximately 10 percent of the worldwide sales figure of $920 million, even though Canada is home to less than 2 percent of the world's Jewish population. Investors flocked to bonds thanks in large part to the 7.2 percent fixed rate return on its five-year bond, said Larry Waller, executive vice-president of State of Israel Bonds. That rate compares favourably to other interest-bearing vehicles while offering the opportunity to make "a financially sound investment that is also a feel good investment," he said.

At the start of the calendar year, Israel projected that it would require $2.2 billion (U.S) from the international sale of bonds. From $950 million to $1 billion was expected from the sale of non-transferable Israel Bonds, while the remainder comprised tradable "Yankee Bonds," Waller said.

Money raised through sale of the securities was earmarked for three specific areas, he continued: "nurturing water resources, constructing a high speed rail line and airport refurbishing."

The water component of the capital projects is to be used for desalination plants while the proposed rail link, which is expected to be completed in five years, will link Tel Aviv to Ben-Gurion Airport and Tel Aviv to Beersheva. Airport renovations are scheduled for completion in 2003.

The Bonds 2000 campaign is already under way, employing the slogan: Israel Bonds: Triple Security.

"We found that people want an ethical investment in addition to a solid financial return," said Hershell Ezrin, CEO of GPC International who is helping to spearhead the new campaign.

"We are picking up on what motivates the buyer. Essentially, you will hear a lot more about how Israel Bonds are financially secure, a secure expression of personal commitment to Judaism, as well as a link to a greater cause.

"It's really a unique investment in that it pays material and spiritual dividends," Ezrin, who served as political adviser to former Ontario premier David Peterson, said.

In addition to the five-year, 7.2 percent bonds, which require a minimum investment of $25,000, Israel Bonds also offers a five-year "Chai Israel" gift bond which sells for $136 and which matures at $180, yielding 5.8 percent. Other terms and foreign currency denominations are available as well.

Israel Bonds have proven popular both within the Jewish market – many pledges are received on Yom Kippur – and among the wider population.

"We are rated by Standard and Poor's and Moody's as single A-minus and we're being considered for AA rating," Waller said. In addition, Israel has never missed a repayment of capital or interest, even in the midst of war, he added.

This year, Bonds salespeople are pushing the sale of bonds as a beneficial way for philanthropists to fulfil their pledges to charitable foundations.

Bonds can be donated in lieu of cash. "You get the deduction, the recipient gets the bond and Israel gets the money," Waller said. "At the end of the day, our customers are satisfied and Israel benefits. That's what really matters."

Recent decisions alter spousal and child support landscape

In a recent lecture to the Canadian Bar Association, law professor Brenda Cosman of the University of Toronto made some pointed remarks about the current state of the law of support in Canada. She described recent Supreme Court decisions last year as radically changing the face of our jurisprudence. The cases — Bracklow, Chartier and M. v. H. — all broaden the scope for entitlement to support to a heretofore unparalleled extent. The new beneficiaries are, in their respective categories (may we have the envelopes, please):

(a) any spouse who, for any reason, is "in need", notwithstanding the length of marriage or whether the marriage had anything to do with causing that need (Bracklow);

(b) the parent of a child whose step-parent has been found to be a step-parent, notwithstanding the lack of any relationship between the child and "step-parent"(Chartier); and

(c) the romantic partner of a same-sex couple (M. v. H.).

Needless to say, in each case the recipient has less money available than the other spouse or parent. I would add the following. Our Spousal Support Database, which summarizes several thousand cases decided since 1992, suggests that across Canada, and particularly in Ontario, the Courts in many cases are "equalizing" incomes where the recipient spouse also has care and control of the children, usually in the form of custody. In fact, in the Toronto area it is becoming increasingly common to award the custodial parent (usually the wife) as much as 60-70% of both parents' total incomes in child and spousal support, leaving the payer with a net after-tax income of only 30-40% on which to survive. Much depends on the number of children involved and the parties' respective gross income levels.

Professor Cosman also suggests that at the same time, the ability to receive public assistance has been dramatically cut back or limited by the State and its taxpayers. I agree with her, but only up to a point. We are not exactly back to the times of the Depression or before the New Deal when an individual in need relied almost entirely on the family and charities as opposed to the State. Notwithstanding news to the contrary, we have not eradicated the welfare state so much as limited its application. With all of their new limitations, we still enjoy the benefits of numerous supports such as socialized medicine, unemployment insurance, Canada Pension, and subsidized post-secondary institutions of learning, in addition to services like public libraries and schools. There is a plethora of government programs for fighting hunger, homelessness, and disease. I don't agree that these programs are being properly funded or well run, but they exist! We all know that taxpayers hungry for tax cuts have staged a revolution through ballot boxes across North America, including Ontario, and the Courts have heard the message: let's make family members who can pay, pay and ease up on the public purse.

Needy spouses at risk

There are conflicting trends. Needy spouses who have no dependent children and do not enjoy an independent income are not getting significant monthly spousal support orders. The Spousal Support Database reveals that even where the husband earns $100,000 yearly and there are no children, the very most a Court has ordered is $3,000 monthly in support, even after a lengthy marriage! After taxes, this monthly payment is reduced significantly (by at least 20%). In jurisdictions outside of the Greater Toronto Area the amounts payable for spousal support are often even less, particularly in the Province of Quebec. Many people in the family Courts are underrepresented or not represented at all. The ability of such litigants, particularly women, to obtain higher spousal support awards has thereby been compromised in many cases.

The amounts actually ordered are often tied to the quality of the legal representation, if any, rather than some grand plan or unified theory of support. In short, better to hire a good lawyer than worry about the law.

Prison chaplains aid perpetrators, victims

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When a crime is committed, prison chaplains are required to deal with both the perpetrator and the victim, says Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of chaplaincy services for Jewish Family & Child Services.

"Chaplains are there for both sides of a disaster," he said at a recent talk sponsored by the adult education department at Temple Sinai.

When Matti Baranovski was killed, Rabbi Weiss said he was one of the first professionals to speak to Matti's family. "I had a completely different reaction, when shortly thereafter, I met two youths who had been arrested for the crime."

Asked to guess how many Jews they think are in the Ontario correctional system, the audience guessed anywhere from 20 to 1,000. "Actually, there are 50, which is, literally, not even a drop in the ocean of prisoners, but when you deal with people one on one and see their anguish, it is 50 too many."

Most crimes revolve around immigration matters, and a minority of the Jewish inmates are violent offenders; the four or five women inmates are mostly in for domestic matters, he said.

Of the 50, about 10 percent are religiously observant, and need kosher food, tallitot and tfillin, and prayer books, said Rabbi Weiss. "Jails are quick to call anything that they don't understand a security issue.

"Tfillin are kept under lock and key," he said, "because guards feel that the straps can be used as a weapon. I bring the prisoners to the guard's office to put on the tfillin as often as I can."

Religious Jews are often picked on by other prisoners, "merely because they are different, and I just tell them to keep their heads down, literally and figuratively," he said.

Kosher food becomes an issue, not only because other prisoners resent the person ordering it, but because it costs more than other food, he said. "It does not endear the Jewish prisoner to anyone in the correctional services."

People have a lot of time to think in jail, said Rabbi Weiss, and when he visits them, he sees a wide range of emotions. "If someone starts to cry and says they can't manage in prison, I feel that he will make sure he does not mess up again.

"On the other hand, if I see a guy with a punk attitude, I figure he will spend more time in jail. Repenting, though, is something I take very seriously."

Some prisoners turn to religion in jail because they have so much time to read and think, "but again, I counsel them not to do anything that will attract attention."

Helping the homeless

took about one hour to get his story, but we discovered that he was an Israeli in his late 30s or early 40s, who was hearing impaired, and spoke no English."

He would not take food from the van, said Rabbi Dolgin, because it was not kosher, so a volunteer went to a store and bought the man something kosher to eat, and we found him a place to stay for the evening.

"He had come to Canada, and for whatever reasons, had been on the streets for three days; the driver had not seen him before. We left him with a telephone number, and we tried to follow up on him, but we have heard nothing about him since.

"I can't imagine anything more lonely than being homeless, deaf and unable to speak English, in Toronto. There are times in my life that I feel I was in a place because I needed to be."

Sharon Polansky and Jo-Anne Page of the temple's social action committee, co-ordinate volunteers who go out on the van. After a night out on the streets, said Polansky, they view people much differently.

"What does it say about stereotypes, when we see a native Canadian helping a homeless Jewish person? We certainly carry around ideas that are different than reality. We can't go out on the van, and see the city in the same light."

Volunteering on the van, said

Rabbi Michael Dolgin

Rabbi Dolgin, is not a good deed, but rather, an obligation. "It is the right thing to do. It is not about solving homelessness, but about getting people through the night. It fulfils an immediate need. These people are out there, and we have to help."

The volunteers were struck, said Polansky, by the community the homeless people have established. "When we approached someone, and asked if he was all right, he told us that he was fine, but that there was a girl on another corner who needed help.

"Most are quite conscious about wasting food. If they don't need something at that moment, they will not take it," she said.

Each evening, before the van goes out, said Rabbi Dolgin, the temple members and volunteers from Na Me Res take part in a social action prayer.

"They are a very spiritual community; that is what has connected us to them."

Helen Redner helps to put books back on the map

Spotlight

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Helen Redner, director of the Jewish Book Fair, says that books are back on the map.

"The mega-book stores have put books back in a popular mode. Reading is in," says Redner, who has directed the fair for 20 of its 23 years.

Redner, born in Poland and brought up in Hamilton, started at the fair as a volunteer. She graduated from Stern College in New York with a degree in literature, and has worked for several publications in Toronto, as a journalist in Israel, and in public relations for the State of Israel Bonds.

"I spend a good portion of the year, between fairs, reading book reviews. One of the main qualifications for my job is I must know how to read."

Toronto's book fair is one of 50 or 60 Jewish book fairs across North America, she says. "There is a large network. We meet at Book Expo America, and share ideas, names and contacts.

The only paid employee of the fair, Redner works with about 1,500 volunteers, and says that every book at the fair is chosen by a committee.

One of her biggest challenges is promoting Canadian Jewish writers "who are generally not well known in American markets.

"Carol Matas, who writes Holocaust books for teenagers, has spoken at U.S. fairs because her books fill a niche. It is unusual, however.

"I would like to see Canadians be more accepted in the United States. It is important for Canadian Jewish writers to have their publicists get information into the American markets and to the American Jewish fairs."

Though the framework of the fair remains the same from year to year, "details change. I can do a lot creatively. I like to develop programs, such as panel discussions, dramatic readings or films based on the books.

"School programs are also a big part of the fair. I get a good feeling when I see a child walk out with an armload of books."

She says, without hesitation that a favourite moment of her year-round job is when she sees the book-fair brochure in print for the first time. "The programs are down in print, and I can enjoy the fruits of my labour.

Helen Redner

"Opening night is also a big high. It is wonderful to see the theatre filled to capacity and confirm that the book fair is a cultural fixture in the city."

Redner, a founding member of the Business and Professional Women's Network of UJA Federation, and a member of the Canadian Jewish Congress executive, says "it is a pleasure to work in the Jewish community. It feels good when I think that I am playing a role in Jewish continuity."

Rabbi explains Torah's outlook on anger control

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was a tale of two teachers.

The first: A man filled with anger, who berated his students at every opportunity. The second: A man who rarely raised his voice or lost his temper.

Rabbi Mordechai Becher, a senior lecturer for Ohr Somayach — an educational outreach program — drew this contrast between the two teachers during a talk last week about anger, titled Who Are You Looking At?: Rage, Our Youth and Ourselves.

Rabbi Becher said the first teacher garnered little respect from his students. "When I see him, I still get a little shudder."

And the second man? He was well respected by his students. At his funeral about two years ago, almost all the students he ever taught attended, Rabbi Becher said.

A friend of Rabbi Becher's, an Australian university professor, surveyed about 5,000 high school students in Melbourne and found that almost all students lose respect for teachers who lose their temper.

On the other hand, if the teacher raises his voice and punishes students but is in control of himself, they still respect him.

Rabbi Avram Rothman, executive director of Ohr Somayach, had asked Rabbi Becher to speak about rage in light of the beating death of Matti Baranovski, a 15-year-old North York student who was killed in November, and the rash of school shootings earlier in the year across North America.

Rabbi Becher quoted experts on the Talmud and the Torah and related personal anecdotes as he spoke about the Torah's outlook on anger and how to deal with an angry child.

When preparing his talk, Rabbi Becher discussed rage with his children. One of his sons pointed out that the Torah's story of the frogs that plagued Egypt was a story of rage.

As Rashi, a commentator on the Bible and Talmud, interprets it, there was only one frog, but the Egyptians kept hitting it with sticks, and every time they hit it, smaller frogs came out, until Egypt was full of frogs.

"The Egyptians did not stop hitting the frog because their rage and anger took over. Logic was no longer an issue," Rabbi Becher said.

One often sees this type of rage among children, he said. Many of us have seen a child building an intricate model of an airplane, and when there is a tiny part of the model he cannot attach, the child will destroy the model in frustration.

Jewish law recognizes that people cannot always control their rage, Rabbi Becher said.

At the time of a dispute, answering back to insults is allowed, but there is a mitzvah in being silent and not answering back when insulted, according to the Sefer Hachinuch, a book on ethics.

Torah holds actions are controllable

This is logical, Rabbi Becher said, referring to the statements of the Chafetz Chaim, a scholar who wrote on ethical issues, because at the time of an insult, it is impossible to be devoid of emotion. However, afterwards, when one's anger has dissipated, the Torah prohibits being angry and taking revenge or bearing a grudge.

While the Torah recognizes that feelings or emotions cannot always be restrained, it holds that actions are controllable, Rabbi Becher said.

So, when dealing with a child's rage, do not criticize the child for being angry, but rather for committing a misdeed.

Rabbi Becher said his wife always tells him never to say to a child, "You are naughty." If a child continually gets the message that he is a bad boy, then he will think he is expected to do bad deeds.

However, "if I call him a good boy who should not be doing that type of action, then he'll see there's an expectation of him to act in an appropriate manner," Rabbi Becher said.

Some rabbis have compared anger to idol worship, he said.

One explanation for this comparison is that "if something controls you and it's anything but God and the moral principles of the Torah, that's tantamount to idol worship," he said.

Another explanation for this comparison is that worshipping oneself or being too self-centred can cause anger.

"If I am at the centre of existence, and everything else is peripheral...then obviously if things are not happening according to my will, that's a reason to be upset," he said.

To avoid this type of anger, it is important to teach children awareness of other people's needs, he said, and parents should teach this to their children by being good role models.

Panel discusses growing demands on Israel's land

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Although the growth of the State of Israel is putting many demands on land and water resources, environmental issues are not a priority, an audience heard in a recent panel discussion on environmental activism in Israel.

The panelists addressed a wide range of environmental topics, which included the construction of Highway 6, the controversial coastal expressway; water shortages, air and water pollution; and regional environment co-operation.

Justin Lewis, a rabbinical student, spoke about traditional Judaism's approach to the environment.

"We have to be restrained in how we work in the world... As a religious Jew, you have to be concerned about the environment."

He said that from a traditional perspective, the world belongs to God and we have to preserve it.

According to the Bible, he said Eretz Yisrael has its own value and needs special care.

The other panelists were Hayat Abu-Saleh, a Druze feminist and environmentalist, and York sociology professor, Stuart Schoenfeld.

Abu-Saleh, a graduate student at York University and an alumna of the Aravat Institute for Environmental, said that although water shortage is one of the most pressing problems, Israelis are not "ready to accept that they cannot have a shower everyday for a half an hour."

To make her point about the low priority Israel gives to the environment, Abu-Saleh showed a slide of a river of untreated sewage in Kibbutz Erez near the Gaza border.

TOURING MT. SINAI: Mount Sinai Hospital recently provided a tour for Israel's new consul general in Toronto, Meir Romem and his wife Rosalind, who met with senior hospital executives and visited several of its facilities. From left are Paul Marcus, vice-president of the hospital's foundation; hospital executive vice-president Joseph Mapa; the Romems; and Dr. Kenneth Pritzker, pathologist-in-chief.

'Major national scare'

Schoenfeld noted that this past fall, the Israeli government introduced some legislation regarding water conservation because the water level of Lake Kinneret, the main supply of fresh water for the country, is dangerously low.

"It was a major national scare," he said.

He listed several areas of environmental problems that have stemmed from the rapid population growth. He said 100 years ago there were only about 400,000 people living in the land that became the Jewish state; today, the same geographical area – the same water and the same land –is supporting a population of 10 million Jews and Arabs.

Schoenfeld said there are projections that the central part of the State of Israel will be more densely populated than Hong Kong and Singapore.

Schoenfeld said the growing affluence of Israelis has put more stress on the environment: the rise in the number of cars has spawned more air pollution, while rapid industrialization has seen an increase in the disposal of hazardous waste.

In the early years of the state, environment was not important as an issue of self preservation, but with regional peace now a possibility the Israeli government recognizes that it can't continue to ignore the environment.

Describing Dahlia Itzik – the present minister of the environment, as an "environmental activist," Schoenfeld said he is encouraged by her commitment to make environmental issues a high priority.

He also praised the work of the Jewish National Fund (JNF), which has promoted reforestation, planting 210 million trees to date.

Schoenfeld also mentioned the work of other environmental organizations – the Israeli Union for Environmental Defence, the Green Student Movement; Green Peace Mediterranean Project, the Heschel Centre for Nature Studies; and the Society for the Protection of Nature in the Middle East.

He said many of the environmental groups have been mobilized in the fight against the construction of Highway 6, the coastal highway modeled after Highway 407 just north of Toronto.

He said that while construction of the highway has started, Canadian activist Henry Gold, who is currently a Jerusalem resident, is spearheading the movement to stop the highway.

He already has 58 MKs who have signed a petition opposing the highway; Gold needs only three more signatures to get a majority of MKs to introduce a bill to end the construction.

The panel discussion was part of a special Shabbaton for Tu b' Shvat, sponsored by the Bloor JCC and the First Narayever Congregation. David Koffman, the discussion moderator organized the evening panel along with Alisa Kukla, Dawn Aarons and Peter Gold.

JVS program helps students clarify their career goals

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Third-year York University student Audrey Dwyer knew her goal was to be a psychologist but she wanted to be sure she had chosen the right career path.

So Dwyer, who works at York University Career Services, signed up for the Assessment Program for Students, a new pilot project created by Jewish Vocational Services of Greater Toronto (JVS).

Since October, more than 80 York University students have participated in this three-phase program which includes personality and aptitude testing, discussion of career goals, and a one-on-one session with a career counsellor.

Its aim is to help students gain the confidence and motivation to explore different career options and to help students clarify the steps needed to achieve their career goals, said Cecile Barington, career counselling co-ordinator at JVS.

All York University students and alumni who have graduated within the last six months are eligible for the program, which lasts until the end of March. The project will then be reassessed.

Human Resources Development Canada funds the program, York University Career Services oversees the program and holds its orientation session and JVS runs the program's sessions.

Cecile Barington, who designed the program, says some students have "tunnel vision" – they are too focused in their career choices.

Often, these students are prone to being unemployed because they do not have skills in the area they have chosen or there are not many openings in their chosen field.

One of the objectives of the program is to expand the focus for those students whose thinking is too narrow and to focus those students whose career goals are too broad, she said.

In the first phase of the program, students take an aptitude, personality and interests test. At the next stage, students participate in a full-day workshop in a small group. Students receive the results of their tests, discuss any career confusion and talk about their personal definitions of success.

"It's a very personal process. They often feel vulnerable and scared, but at the same time relief [at being] able to share with others similar experiences and what they want to be in this world," Barington said.

A profile of each student, based on his or her personality, interests and values is mapped out and put on the wall. At the end of the day, the group focuses on one profile for about 15 minutes and brainstorms career options for that person.

"An outsider can give you a perspective that is quite illuminating," Barington said.

Students often have secretly thought of pursuing a certain career path and are surprised to hear others suggest it, she said.

Final phase

In the final phase, students discuss the results of their aptitude test in a one-on-one session with a career counsellor from JVS and develop an action step sheet, which helps students map out how to achieve their career goals, said Barington.

Upon completion of the program, students receive a 10-page report which provides a summary of recommended career options based on personality, education, interests, aptitude and values.

During the program, Dwyer learned of career avenues she was not aware of, she said. She also learned that she can gain experience in counselling with just a master's degree in psychology, without having her PhD.

For Dwyer, this came as a relief.

"It takes away some of the pressure that you're going to be in school forever," she said.

The most valuable part of the process for the 23-year-old was the one-on-one session with a career counsellor.

Her results confirmed that she is on the right career path and her aptitude tests gave her confidence.

"I have the aptitude to be exactly what I want to be," she said.

Jewish law students go high-tech

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Jewish Law Students Association (CJLSA) has introduced a new way for law students across the country to communicate.

The CJLSA, which is the umbrella organization for Jewish student law associations across Canada, has created a listserve – a central address users e-mail which sends their messages to every Jewish law student on the list.

While much of the listserve's dialogue has centred around the association's annual convention, which was held last weekend, Jillian Siskind, president of the CJLSA and a third-year University of Ottawa law student, says there are other uses for the listserve.

"I see it as a potential vehicle for so much more – getting Jewish law students from across the country speaking to each other, brainstorming ideas on starting clubs and how to become involved in the Jewish legal community."

Students can ask questions of the association or other students and receive information on speakers and events, she explained.

Almost every law school across Canada has a representative connected to this listserve who is responsible for forwarding listserve messages to law students at their school or putting up flyers about events posted on the listserve, Siskind said.

Only one representative on each campus is connected because when too many people are on the listserve, users become inundated with information, she said.

But, the association is looking to build the number of law students on the list, Siskind said.

For more information on the association or its listserve, contact CJLSA@hotmail.com.

Age fails to slow synagogue president

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Herman Landau is picked up and taken home by car three times a day so that he can daven at his beloved shul, Agudath Israel Congregation.

Landau, 92, is president of Agudath Israel on McGillivray Avenue. He also works on behalf of two hospitals in Israel and is a former member of the executive of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

He has two children, Samuel Moishe Landau, a computer consultant, and Esther Markowitz, a director of human resources, both in Cleveland, Ohio, as well as 11 grandchildren and nine great-grandchildren.

Landau makes a point of keeping up to date with events in the community and in Israel.

"When I came to Toronto in 1951, I knew every Orthodox Jew personally," he said in an interview. "Now it's impossible to know them all, the community is so large. I don't even know every member of our congregation."

Landau is a calm and tolerant person who stands strongly by his Orthodoxy without denigrating those from a different stream of Judaism.

"My mission is not to encourage people to become Orthodox. I know there are two types of Jews in the world. Those who observe Shabbat. and those who are yet to observe Shabbat."

It is a misconception, he said, that Orthodox Jews do not consider Conservative Jews as real Jews, and he believes this canard has soured relations between the two groups.

He is reluctant to give advice to young people on how to reach his venerable age. "I'm not a person to give advice," he said. "All I know is that Jews must remain Jews. Otherwise we'll be extinguished."

Landau lost his family in the Holocaust, and escaped from Germany to Switzerland after hair-raising experiences.

His family was deported from Germany, where he was born, to Krakow, but when Landau was 32, the Germans allowed him to return to Poland to settle the accounts of his father's egg importing business.

On his way there in May 1939, he stopped in Berlin, where he was told that returning to Poland was a death warrant. He was advised that Jews could go to Italy without a visa, and he called the airport immediately. The plane was held up for 25 minutes. He was the last Jew to leave for Italy in that way.

From Italy, he found his way to his brother, Henry, in Belgium, where he married his wife, Helen, who died three years ago.

In 1942, a group of 10, including Landau's brother and wife, made their way into Switzerland via a 10-hour march through the Alps. They were so close to the enemy as they walked that they could hear Germans talking to each other.

In Switzerland, Landau was director, from 1942 to 1951, of Vaad Hazalahan, an arm of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis, which spirited countless Jews out of Germany and returned many Jewish children to their parents. Another 100,000 Jews could have been saved, he said, if Hitler had not stopped the trains bringing them in from Theresienstadt.

With Prime Minister Yitzchak Shamir and Agudath Israel World Organization Co-chairman, Rabbi Yehuda Meir Abramowitz; Herman Landau of Toronto, speaking.

He made a valiant effort to save Rabbi Aaron Levine, who was head of the Agudath Israel movement. With the help of a papal nuncio, he got a Paraguayan passport for Rabbi Levine, but it was too late. The rabbi had been murdered in Lvov, Poland.

Referring to current issues, he said that from his own knowledge of the subject, he feels the compensation package offered by Switzerland to Holocaust survivors "is a fair settlement. I know there are people who don't like it, but I don't think it's possible to satisfy everyone."

Landau visited Israel every second year, until five years ago, when his health made it unfeasible.

"I wouldn't recognize it today," he said.

As a Canadian, he feels he does not have the right to criticize any aspect of negotiations with Syria.

However, he quoted with approval a letter to the New York Times belabouring 300 rabbis for advocating that Jerusalem be shared between Israelis and Palestinians. The letter said the 300 rabbis should make aliyah, have their children enlist in the Israel Defence Army, and reconsider their proposal.

Syrians have a reputation for not keeping to their agreements, Landau added.

A MUSICAL CELEBRAISHON

On the occasion of our Chai (18th) anniversary, Aish HaTorah proudly presents "A Celebration of Music" at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts on Tuesday, March 14 and Wednesday, March 15, featuring the world-famous Oshy Tugendhaft and Sydenham South African Men's Choir.

The show, "Celebration," comprises six musical themes portraying the triumph of Jewish destiny, and the cherished traditions and values that make up the Jewish people. The show, which includes an audiovisual presentation, weaves a musical tapestry that "bridges the gap" between all generations. Also participating are Toronto's own Eitz Chaim Boys Choir under the direction of Yehuda Gilden, and the Kol Tov Band. The show is being produced for Aish HaTorah by Gavin Opert.

International recording star Oshy Tugendhaft is the lead vocalist, the Cantor of the Sydenham Hebrew Congregation and resident Cantor of the internationally renowned Johannesburg Jewish Male Choir. The Sydenham Choir is acknowledged as one of the finest choirs of its genre in the world!

The music is arranged by Dr. Jeanne Zaidel-Rudolph, considered one of South Africa's most versatile composers.

For information, tickets, group rates, and early-bird discounts, please call 905-764-1818 x370. "Celebration" is a real millennium musical tribute!

Aish HaTorah is one of the leading Jewish Outreach movements in the world. With 20 branches worldwide, Aish HaTorah is a place where Jewish people from all affiliations come together in a warm, relaxed setting to explore the relevance, richness and wisdom of Judaism.

The Toronto branch was opened in 1981 in a small office with 5 Rabbis and two phones. In September 1996 we moved to our new home, a 21,000-square-foot building in Thornhill. In cooperation with our Rabbis, hundreds of lay teachers and activists are involved in educational programs for singles, couples and families of all ages and affiliations. Twenty daytime and evening classes per week are attended by more than 250 students.

Today, Toronto Aish is a network of three partner synagogues and outreach centers.

Aish Thornhill, at 949 Clark Ave. W., which also serves as the head office.

Westmount, currently renting space at Westmount Collegiate Institute on Bathurst, Thornhill, has had major success in drawing hundreds of people to its extensive Shabbat programs.

The Village Shul, a unique family center in the Forest Hill community, recently moved from rented space to its own magnificent building at 1072 Eglinton Ave. W.

In addition to our synagogues centres, Aish Young Professionals and Campus provides Jewish singles with opportunities to meet each other in meaningful and fun ways. Activities include rock climbing, S.H.W.G. (Shabbat Weekend Getaway), the Second Cup learning series and Social Action activities

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 17 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 7 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Wednesday, March 8, 2000 at Adath Israel Synagogue, 37 Southbourne Ave. (Bathurst & Wilson). It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:30 p.m. This year we are happy to welcome back Ines DiSanto of Chez Moi who will be presenting her 2000 bridal collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

"There are a lot of bridal trade shows offered to the public," says Kay. "The Celebration of Stars Show" is geared solely to the Jewish community. All of the exhibitors rely on Jewish simchas for the core of their business."

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. You have the luxury of making an instant decision based on what you have seen, heard or tasted, or mull it over and decide at a later date. Many of the exhibitors will be offering show discounts and numerous give-aways. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-882-2042.

DJ extraordinaire makes partying serious business

TORONTO — At the ripe young age of 22, when many of his peers are interested in partying, Miki Klevan has become a serious player in Canada's disc jockey and party promotion business.

His four-year-old Concord-based company, Freedom of Sound, averages 20 events a week, and owns props and inventory worth $600,000. Klevan has a roster of 40 DJs and emcees, and 20 dancers, and employs a full-time staff of five to keep the party action going.

So what makes Miki tick?

"It's the buzz I get from making people happy, from entertaining the world," the youthful entrepreneur says from his brand new corporate office in Thornhill. "It's not about the money. It's about doing what I love doing."

Cutting through the hype, Klevan points out he personally emcees every weekend and wouldn't have it any other way.

Gregarious and self-assured to a degree that belies his youth, Klevan clearly thrives on the vibe - on the energy and good feelings that he brings out in people.

Born in a suburb of Tel Aviv, Israel, Klevan recalls that as a kid he used to build lighting fixtures as a hobby. Needless to say, offering his homemade party equipment for free to his classmates made him popular at elementary school.

Moving to Toronto in 1989, Klevan let his passion slide while he was busy adjusting to a new life here. But in 1995 he invested $4,000 earned at a summer job in professional audio equipment - a CD player, mixer and sound equalizer. Klevan vividly recalls a conversation he had then with his best friend Michael Blankstein who questioned investing hard-earned money in sound equipment for a business that didn't have a single booking.

For his first DJ gig in March 1996, for a pre-teen disco, Klevan rented speakers and amplifiers since he didn't have enough money to buy the equipment. That initial contract turned into a lucky break. Klevan became the operator of The Diamond Club, a Friday night weekly disco aimed at 10-14 year olds, held in a converted daycare centre at the Promenade Mall in Thornhill. The club proved enormously popular, regularly attracting crowds of 100-120. With admission of $7 plus pop and chip sales, Klevan was grossing more than $700 nightly, which he split with the day care centre. Those profits didn't escape the notice of the mall's operators. When the lease was about to expire in May 1997, the Promenade management asked for a five-fold increase in rent. Klevan decided it was time to move on.

Folding the pre-adolescent dance club, Klevan turned Freedom of Sound back to his original concept of an independent disc jockey service. That summer when he had his first double booking for the same night, he hired Stephan Lugassy - now the company's production manager, to deejay. Almost immediately he also began hiring male and female interactive dancers, and acquiring special effects equipment and props.

Today Freedom of Sound offers an array of fun stuff including laser systems, dry ice machines, indoor pyrotechnics, karaoke, audio visual equipment, casino equipment and carnival food dispensers, as well as an army of jugglers, fire breathers, clowns, celebrity look-a-likes and other specialty entertainers.

Klevan regularly sends his performers out on the road to functions in Montreal, Ottawa, Winnipeg, and Vancouver.

Klevan's most ambitious celebration to date was at Ontario Place in May 1998 when he and his crew entertained 15,000 people marking Israel's 50th anniversary in a day-long extravaganza put on by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

How much are people spending today on a celebration?

Most private bar and bat mitzvah parties today are budgeting $1,500 - $2,000 just for DJ services, notes Klevan. That usually includes a DJ, an emcee, intelligent lighting, two interactive dancers, party novelties, and special effects such as exploding streamers or indoor fireworks that accompany the guest of honour at his/her debut onto the dance floor.

PARTY ANIMAL: Miki Klevan, running one of the most sought after entertainment services in Canada.

"People want innovation. They want something different," notes Klevan.

Making a themed event can carry a heftier price tag. Freedom of Sound offers dozens of theme decors including medieval times, Star Trek and sports hoopla that would make Wayne Gretzky want to reconsider retirement.

But Klevan notes a theme concept makes for a party that is unique. Customers clearly agree. In a recent letter of thanks a satisfied client wrote: Your sparkle made our wedding reception. Your finesse, charm and great dancing made a celebration we will never forget."

Besides weddings, bar/bat mitzvah parties, and sweet sixteen celebrations, Freedom of Sound's services have become popular with corporate events. Among the Christmas parties the company hosted this year were Bell Mobility, Pizza Pizza, Highway 407 ETR, and Nike Canada.

You may have also noticed Freedom of Sound at the North York General Hospital's recent 30th anniversary gala for its breast cancer diagnostic centre - one of the dozens of charity events at which Klevan and his crew volunteered their services last year.

"We strongly believe that after a successful year it's time to give back to the community," Klevan adds.

He cuts the interview short explaining he has to do his weekly training seminar for DJs, emcees and dancers. "We're a team-oriented place. I insist on offering a consistent quality of high service. There's no place in this industry for egos. Making it look like the fun is all being improvised involves split-second timing and long hours of rehearsals. That's what being a professional entertainer is all about."

Klevan demands his staff put in a sweat-pouring-down-the-face exuberance. Hence his company slogan: "on a scale of 1 to 10, we're 11!"

It's a perfectionist's formula for fun that has made Klevan and Freedom of Sound one of the most sought after entertainment services in Canada.

What of the future? "Work, work, work," answers Klevan, who is managing to study business administration part-time at York University. "I'm having so much fun, why would I want to stop?"

For more information call (905) 760-0040 or visit Freedom of Sound's web site at www.freedomofsound.com.

UIA Fed. Canada programs to develop leaders of the future

By WENDY GOLDBLATT SCHNEIDER
CJN Correspondent

VANCOUVER — If the well-being of Canada's Jewish communities is directly related to the quality of its leaders, the future has never looked brighter.

Developing and nurturing young Jewish leaders throughout the country has become a priority for UIA Federations Canada; the organization has demonstrated its commitment by sponsoring a number of national young leadership endeavors.

The most recent event, held over the weekend of Jan. 21 to 23 in Vancouver, was the first national Young Leadership Executive Institute, Leadership in Motion.

The institute brought together 25 lay and professional young leaders from across the country, each of whom are involved in leadership development within their respective communities.

The goals of the institute, said Eli Rubenstein, director of leadership development for UIA Federations Canada, were three-fold. One was to give participants techniques they can use to enrich young leadership programming in their communities and Federation campaigns. Another was to reinforce participants' own leadership skills and to get them thinking about what qualities are embodied in the concept of Jewish leadership.

The third objective was to create an environment whereby executive members could create close relationships with each other, consequently building their own community of young Canadian Jewish leaders from across the country.

Maxyne Finkelstein, executive director of UIA Federations Canada, one of the institute's presenters, said she was delighted with the program.

Describing the conference "as a turning point for the organization," she pointed out that many of the institute's participants will be the future leaders of Canadian Jewish communities.

Building a young leadership network across the country was the vision of Richard Diamond, 39, chair of UIA Federation's young leadership executive.

When Diamond was first asked, three years ago, to sit on the national board of UIA Federation to represent young leadership, there was virtually nothing in place at a national level to connect the individuals across the country who were involved in young leadership programming.

A passionate advocate of communication and team building, Diamond said he felt compelled to fill what he saw as a void in the exchange of information and in the grooming of talented and committed young people who might have aspirations to move beyond local community activity into the national arena.

With the help of Rubenstein, Diamond set out to build a team of young leaders from across the country. Last April, a national young leadership conference in Toronto that attracted nearly 200 participants,

Diamond presented his vision of a young leadership executive consisting of the top young leaders in each community across the country. A number of initiatives were set in motion, including the Vancouver Institute, a national education program. The institute's goal will be to provide the highest quality of education programming to a select group young of leaders and potential leaders across the country.

A young leadership fly-in to the Former Soviet Union, and a national conference to be held next winter in Ottawa are expected to draw 300 people.

Strub part of pickle empire

By WENDY GOLDBLATT SCHNEIDER
CJN Correspondent

Born in 1917, in Kharkov, Russia, during the Russian Revolution, he immigrated to Hamilton at the age of four, with his parents, Michael and Sophie Strub, and his siblings.

Unlike his older brother and sister, who were very connected to their Russian roots, Daniel was, according to niece, Doris Epstein, "all Canadian."

Obituary

The Strubs created an extended family, characterized by exceptional closeness and mutual devotion.

With no children of their own, Daniel and his wife, Natalie, cultivated close relationships with their nieces and nephews and their children and grandchildren.

Daniel's caring also extended into the Hamilton community and he gave generously to a number of local causes, including Shalom Village, the Hamilton Hebrew Academy, the Hamilton General Hospital and McMaster University.

Daniel represented the last link with the generation that founded Strub Brothers Limited. In 1929, his brother Irvin, who passed away in 1997, founded the company, which today packs and ships more than 60 million pickles across North America each year.

Strub Brothers Limited celebrated its 70th anniversary in 1999.

Although he retired in 1986, Daniel continued to come into the office once or twice a week and acted as an ambassador for Strubs Pickles until his death.

Daniel Strub is survived by his loving wife, Natalie.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

The days of judgment approach for Preston Manning. As we write, disenchanted Reformers, neo-Tories and those determined to preserve the original essence of Reform are gathering in Ottawa to participate in the United Alternative convention.

Lots of individuals have a big stake in these developments. To be sure, Manning is playing "for all the marbles." Time will tell if he gambled successfully, but in many respects, he has already lost a considerable amount of the credibility he has managed to garner over the last few years.

The other individual who has most to gain or lose in this drama is Joe Clark. But like Manning, he too has already lost much and only a massive rejection of the UA could salvage Clark's future electoral prospects.

It's hard not to feel some pity for Earnest Joe. With possibly the worst sense of political judgment of any Canadian leader in the 20th Century, Clark has consistently misread everything from the public mood to caucus support over the past 25 years.

In recent weeks, his glee at witnessing the steady collapse of the UA initiative has been marred by a growing Tory caucus revolt and by the public spectacle of Tory MPs who would rather quit politics than continue to serve with Clark as leader of the federal party.

Published polls that suggest Ontario voters will not vote for Clark, regardless of the outcome of the UA convention and the steady departure of aides and others in his entourage (reminiscent of the proverbial rats abandoning the sinking ship), attest to the fragility of his situation.

The only one who doesn't recognize the futility of his situation is Joe Clark himself. In a town filled with arrogance, self-certainty and plain old egoism, Clark takes a back seat to no one. He has convinced himself that once the UA initiative proves to be the colossal failure he predicts it will be, all of those Canadians with roots on the right end of the political spectrum will come flocking home to him.

At the end of the day, arrogance and poor judgment will cause the downfall of both Manning and Clark.

But we were not quite accurate when we suggested at the top of this column that they were the two biggest stakeholders in last weekend's convention. We are – the Canadian people.

And it is we who will ultimately pay for their arrogance.

Manitoba twins are a millennial first

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Richard Buchwald, the father of newly born twins, Rachael and Serena, says he is "excited, elated, relieved and thrilled. I can't stop smiling."

What makes the twin's birth even more special is that they are the first Manitoba-born twins of the new millennium.

"So far, we haven't received any of those gift hampers that new year's babies get," says Buchwald, a Winnipeg lawyer. "We wouldn't say no if any were offered."

Rachael and Serena were born to Buchwald and his wife, Tracy Leipsic,an account manager for Leipsic Insurance, on Jan. 4. The girls were born two months premature.

The official due date was Feb. 25. However, because of complications, Leipsic spent most of December in hospital.

The babies were delivered by emergency caesarean section. Rachael was three pounds 11 ounces at birth while, Serena weighed in at two ounces more.

The twins are scions of prominent Winnipeg Jewish families. The Leipsic family has been well known in the city's property development and insurance business for close to 100 years.

Richard Buchwald's father is Harold Buchwald, who is known nationally and internationally for his volunteer work on behalf of the Jewish and general communities. The younger Buchwald is a member of his father's law firm, Pitblado Buchwald Asper.

Buchwald and Leipsic have been married for three years. Rachael and Serena are their first children.

"We are happy to all be home," says Buchwald. "We have a night nurse helping us over the first little while."

Caricaturist Beutel appealing libel conviction

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — While a high profile libel case involving Holocaust "revisionism" wound its way through the British court system, a much lower profile defamation case involving an editorial cartoonist and a racist school teacher was heard by the New Brunswick Court of Appeal.

Caricaturist Josh Beutel was before the court to appeal a 1998 lower court decision that found he libeled former Moncton school teacher Malcolm Ross by comparing him to a Nazi propagandist Josef Goebbels. Beutel's caricature of Ross was presented in 1993 at a meeting of the New Brunswick Teachers' Association.

The lower court ruled that while Beutel could legitimately characterize Ross as a racist and an anti-Semite, there was no evidence that Ross subscribed to the Nazi policy of exterminating Jews. The court ordered Beutel to pay Ross $7,500 in damages.

Though not in the same league as the suit launched in London by David Irving versus Holocaust scholar Deborah Lipstadt, the Ross/Beutel case raised important issues of fair comment and libel chill.

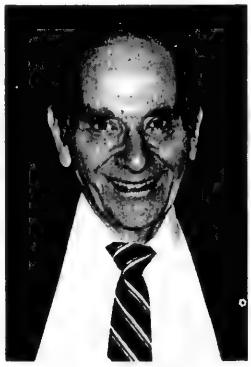
Canadian Jewish Congress, the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association (CCLA), the Canadian Newspaper Association and the Association of Canadian Editorial Cartoonists all joined in Beutel's appeal as interveners.

Congress, represented by lawyer Joel Richler, argued that characterizing someone as a Nazi does not necessarily suggest they are a card-carrying member of that party. In contemporary usage, "racist," "anti-Semitic" and "Nazi" are virtually indistinguishable and interchangeable. Anti-Semitism, racism and Nazism form an unbroken continuum and Ross' views reflect medieval anti-Semitism that was adopted by the Nazi regime, Richler argued.

For its part, the CCLA contended that "people in the community [should get] as much wide elbow room as possible to criticize public figures," said Alan Borovoy, the organization's general counsel. "We are concerned that the law is too inhospitable for criticizing public figures."

Doug Christie, Ross' lawyer, said Beutel's representation "mocked Ross' religious beliefs" and humiliated him.

Marvin Kurz, legal counsel for the League for Human Rights, pointed out that in recent years, a spate of libel suits have been launched against anti-racist organizations and individuals, among which are the cases of Congress being sued by Ernst Zundel (for opposing his planned use of a Parliament Hill speaking venue) and the League being sued by Paul Fromm, a former teacher removed for his racist activities. "In all of this, there's a danger of creating a libel chill," Kurz suggested.



Alan Borovoy

The cases have been initiated within the last two to three years and "there does seem to be a pattern, and you can include Irving versus Lipstadt," said Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations for Congress.

New program helps train Jewish studies educators

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Western Canadian Jewish schools have launched a new program for training people from their own communities to teach Judaic studies in their respective school systems.

The two-year-old Western Canada Coalition of Jewish Educators (WCCJE) recently forged a partnership with York University for training Western Canadians to become Judaic studies teachers.

Funding for this new initiative has come, in part, from the New York-based Covenant Foundation, which will provide $180,000 (Cdn) over five years. This is the first time the American foundation has funded a Canadian proposal.

"It has become increasingly hard finding Jewish teachers from elsewhere who are willing to come and teach in Western Canada," says Jack Solomon, superintendent of Winnipeg's Board of Jewish Education.

"The number of Jewish day schools in the U.S. is exploding. We used to be able to bring in teachers from Israel, because our salaries were so much higher. But that is not the case anymore."

As there are no teacher training programs for Jewish studies in Western Canada, the WCCJE turned to Dr. Alex Pomson, the Koschitzky Professor of Jewish Education and the co-ordinator of the Jewish Teacher Education Program at York University, for suggestions.

York has the only education faculty in North America that trains people for both Jewish studies and general studies.

The goal of the program, Solomon explains, is to recruit five or six students every two years from Western Canada who are interested in teaching Judaic studies.

The Covenant Foundation grant, he notes, would cover a part of their tuition for York, while each of the four Jewish school systems or communities in Western Canada (Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver) will contribute up to $10,000 a year for five years toward tuition costs. The students would have to come up with the remainder of the money.

The York program would include a year of study at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and teaching practicums in the students' home communities.

Graduates would have to make a commitment to teach in the Jewish community school systems in their respective home communities for a minimum of three years.

Election funding scandal swirls around Barak

By RON CSILLAG and VIVA PRESS
CJN Staff

A Canadian charity has been linked to the election finance scandal swirling around Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

The Calgary-based Kahanoff Foundation was cited by the Israeli daily newspaper Yediot Achronot last week for allegedly having been a source of funds to various organizations, 60,000 shekels of which found their way to Barak's election campaign last year.

Allegations against Barak's One Israel party were contained in a report released last week by state comptroller Eliezer Goldberg,who accused the party of a "flagrant breach" of Israeli electoral laws.

Goldberg fined the party 13.8 million shekels – more than $3.2 million (US) – three times the 5.2 million shekels he alleged were channelled unlawfully into Barak's successful campaign last May.

His report referred to an unnamed Canadian charity as the source from which 60,000 shekels – out of the 5.2 million channelled from non-profit organizations – found their way into the One Israel party campaign, and it details large transfers from overseas sources into non-profit groups set up to back and fund Barak's election bid.

Foreign donations to political parties are illegal under Israeli laws governing election campaigns, and they sharply limit the amount a domestic donor may give.

Moments after Goldberg's report was issued, Israel's attorney general, Elyakim Rubinstein, ordered a criminal probe into the scandal, the first to rock Barak's government.

"Contributions were channelled to some of the non-profit organizations under a veil of secrecy, which included the use of middlemen. Some of these contributions came from abroad, some from corporations, and some involved large sums of money – all of which are prohibited by the Party Funding Law," Rubinstein wrote in his call for a police probe.

In some cases, he said, the overseas donors did not know where the money was headed. One source of money, the Camilla Fund, was set up by Swiss millionaire Oktav Buettner to relieve poverty and promote education in Israel. Buettner died in 1998, and the fund has since been managed by Yitzhak Herzog, a lawyer who led Barak's campaign and who is now the prime minister's cabinet secretary.

According to Yediot Achronot, Herzog similarly transferred funds from the Kahanoff Foundation.

Yitzhak Herzog

The state comptroller's report said Yitzhak Herzog is the legal adviser to the foundation's Israeli arm, and had power of attorney for it.

Incorporated in Alberta in 1979, the Kahanoff Foundation funds a myriad of social, medical, cultural and educational endeavours, in both Canada and Israel.

The foundation's president, James Hume, told The CJN in a phone interview from Calgary: "I'm really astonished our name's been associated with this report. I am disturbed to learn that small donations we made to support community programs in Israel were apparently used to support political activities. We don't fund political activities. We only fund charitable activities in Israel. That's our business over there."

Shira Herzog, the foundation's vice-president, one of its directors, and a regular columnist with The CJN, is a cousin to Yitzhak Herzog.

Tax returns obtained by The CJN show that in 1998, the foundation donated $3.4 million to 24 Israeli groups, including the municipality of Jerusalem, the Hebrew University, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, Beit Issie Shapiro, the Centre for Educational Technology, the Israel Association of Community Centres, Dor Shalom, a non-profit organization founded following the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, and Meimad, a religious educational movement that subsequently formed a religious political party that was folded into Barak's One Israel coalition.

In the same year, the foundation donated $4.9 million to 79 charitable groups in Calgary, Toronto, Vancouver and Edmonton.

At a news conference last week, Barak said he would appeal the comptroller's fine and said he was too busy campaigning to supervise his coalition's fund-raising activities.

The report is the first major breach in Barak's credibility, and has disconcerting echoes of the scandals that plagued, and helped Barak defeat, his predecessor, Benjamin Netanyahu, now under police investigation for bribery and theft allegations.

"He knew about the system," Likud party leader Ariel Sharon said of Barak. "Perhaps not all the details, but he knew about the system."

In Barak's defence, One Israel Knesset member Avi Yehezkel said, "Barak's hands are clean and he is as straight as an arrow." He said the "Likud [should] go bark up another tree, and stop making personal attacks against Barak."

The Likud, as well as other parties, was also fined for similar irregularities in the report. Nineteen parties were found to have violated the Party Funding Law, but Goldberg said violations by One Israel were the most conspicuous. Among those fined were the Likud for 500,000 shekels; Yisrael Beiteinu, 270,000 shekels; Centre party, 2,868,860 shekels; Meretz, 781,363 shekels; United Torah Judaism, 500,000 shekels; Am Ehad, 250,000 shekels; and Shas, 813,996 shekels.

The other parties may also face criminal investigation, Goldberg said.

Stockholm meeting

Canada's two-page final declaration congratulates Sweden for convening the historic gathering, the third in a series of major conferences on war-era assets, financial claims, and commemoration and pedagogy.

Canada said it "endorses wholeheartedly" the Stockholm conference's final document, which declares, in part, that:

• "The Holocaust challenged the foundations of civilization. The unprecedented character of the Holocaust will always hold universal meaning.

• "The magnitude of the Holocaust must forever be seared into our collective memory. The depths of its horror and the heights of its heroism can be touchstones in our understanding of the human capacity for evil and good.

• "With humanity still scarred by genocide, ethnic cleansing, racism, anti-Semitism and xenophobia, the international community shares a solemn responsibility to fight those evils. Together, we must uphold the terrible truth of the Holocaust against those who deny it.

• "We pledge to strengthen efforts to promote education, remembrance and research about the Holocaust.

• "We will promote education in our schools and universities [and] communities.

•"We share a commitment to commemorate the victims of the Holocaust and to honour those who stood against it. We will encourage appropriate forms of remembrance, including an annual Day of Holocaust Remembrance in our countries.

• "We share a commitment to throw a light on the still-obscured shadows of the Holocaust. We will take all necessary steps to facilitate the opening of archives.

• "Our commitment must be to remember the victims who perished, respect the survivors still with us, and reaffirm humanity's common aspiration for mutual understanding and justice."

Rochelle Wilner, who represented B'nai Brith Canada at the conference, said in a statement that the delegation returned "with increased resolve to counter hate propaganda and Holocaust denial, and to speak up against human rights abuses, so the horrors of the Holocaust will never happen again."

B'nai Brith also said Canada should not shy away from establishing a free-standing Holocaust museum.

Human rights lawyer David Matas, a Canadian delegate, said the acknowledgment by many countries of "the disgrace of their past histories" was welcomed. "It behooves Canada to do the same, including [to acknowledge] our dismal track record on bringing Nazi war criminals to justice," Matas said.

In its statement, Canada noted its support for symposiums on fighting Nazi ideology and Holocaust denial on the Internet. It added that the Supreme Court has upheld the hate propaganda sections of the Criminal Code as consistent with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and that Parliament has passed laws requiring enhanced sentences for hate-motivated crimes.

Irving dismisses gas chambers

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A Holocaust revisionist who is suing a U.S. historian for libel, has dismissed eyewitness accounts, drawings and photographs of Auschwitz gas chambers that showed vents in the roof through which lethal gases were introduced.

David Irving is suing Deborah Lipstadt, a professor of Jewish studies at Emory University in Atlanta, and her British publisher, Penguin Books, for libel. Irving insisted at his trial last week, that there were no such vents, and that their absence "totally demolished" evidence that the gas chambers were used to kill inmates at Auschwitz.

He asserted that the Nazis used the Auschwitz gas chambers solely for the purpose of delousing corpses and their clothing.

The comments by Irving, who is representing himself, came in the course of cross-examining Auschwitz expert Robert Van Pelt.

Irving, who is seeking damages, claims to have been professionally ruined after being described as a Holocaust denier and a distorter of historical data to conform with his own ideological disposition, in Lipstadt's 1994 book Denying The Holocaust. The Growing Assault On Truth And Memory.

Van Pelt, a Dutch historian who works at the University of Waterloo in Canada, served as adviser to the Auschwitz authorities on the reconstruction of the site, which was demolished by the Germans in late 1944 and early 1945.

Van Pelt referred to an SS photograph taken in February 1943 that showed openings on the roof of Crematorium II at Auschwitz through which lethal Zyklon-B pellets were introduced into the gas chambers.

But Irving claimed that the picture was taken during the building process in December 1942, and that the objects on the roof were drums of sealant.

Van Pelt also produced an aerial photograph taken by the Americans in the summer of 1944 that showed "four dots" – which he described as "introduction devices" – on the roof of Crematorium II.

But Irving questioned the authenticity of the photograph and said that the dots were too big for such a purpose.

Irving also said the testimony of Henryk Tauber, a Jewish inmate forced to work in Crematorium II, stretched "a reasonable historian's credibility."

He dismissed as "lurid" Tauber's eyewitness accounts of how he saw the SS set one Jew on fire and throw another into a pit of boiling human fat – and he rejected Tauber's description of how he had helped to incinerate the corpses of up to 2,500 Greek, French and Dutch Jews a day in Crematorium II.

He also rejected Tauber's contention that he had seen cyanide pellets poured into the gas chambers through small "chimneys."

He was unmoved, too, by an account of a "field of ashes" from human remains, some of which was spread on icy roads to assist the passage of vehicles.

Says they were used for delousing

According to Irving, a number of revisionist researchers had entered the ruins of Crematorium II, where Holocaust historians have determined that 500,000 people were slaughtered.

The revisionists, said Irving, photographed the collapsed underside of the roof but found no vents, which, he contended, "blows holes in the whole gas chambers story.

"I do not accept that the Nazis, in the last frantic days of the camp, when they were in a blue funk, would have gone around with buckets of cement filling the holes that they were going to dynamite," he told the High Court in London.

Irving has denied that the gas chambers at Auschwitz were used for human extermination, and he has insisted that fewer than 100,000 Jews died – mostly of natural causes – at Auschwitz, which he has sought to portray as a particularly brutal labour camp.

But Van Pelt told the court there was "a massive amount of evidence" that one million Jews were systematicallly exterminated in the death camp by the Nazis.

He said the accumulated evidence and corroborating testimony that had emerged since World War II, made it a "moral certainty" that the gas chambers were the main instruments of murder at Auschwitz between the summer of 1942 and the fall of 1944.

"It will be clear that, by early 1947, there was a massive amount of evidence of the use of the camp as a site for mass extermination," said Van Pelt.

"This evidence had become slowly available during the war as the result of reports by escaped inmates," he said. "It had become more substantial through the eyewitness accounts of former Auschwitz inmates immediately after their liberation, and was confirmed in the Polish forensic investigations undertaken in 1945 and 1946.

"Finally," he said, "this evidence was corroborated by confessions of leading German personnel employed at Auschwitz during its years of operation."

Confessions given by leading German personnel at the camp included that of SS officer Pery Broad, who testified to gassings and burning of corpses, and former camp commandant Rudolf Hess.

The court also learned that there was evidence from the 1961 Eichmann trial in Jerusalem; documentary evidence of the construction of the camp, including workers' time sheets; plans; photographs; and scientific studies of cyanide compounds in the walls of the gas chambers.

"In short," Van Pelt said, "it has become possible to assert as moral certainty, the statement that Auschwitz was an extermination camp where the Germans killed around one million people with the help of gas chambers."

Questioned by Irving, Van Pelt said he had been "more than deeply moved" by his experience of visiting Auschwitz.

"I was frightened," he said. "I don't believe in ghosts. I have never seen any at Auschwitz. But it is an awesome place and an awesome responsibility as an historian."

Asked by Irving about the dangers of conducting historical work at Auschwitz, Van Pelt responded, "One's duty is to be unemotional and objective, but to remain human in the exercise."

Neo-Nazis protest Holocaust memorial in Berlin

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BERLIN — Hundreds of neo-Nazis demonstrated on the weekend at the site of Germany's planned memorial to Holocaust victims and took the politically charged move of marching through Berlin's landmark Brandenburg Gate.

The extreme-right National Party of Germany had been banned by police from demonstrating because of fears of violence, but a court overturned the decision and allowed the event to go forward.

Hundreds of police blocked streets in central Berlin to make way for about 500 demonstrators, who headed down the main Unter den Linden boulevard to the site of the memorial.

They then marched through the nearby Brandenburg Gate – an act that is particularly symbolic in Germany, given that Nazi troops, during Adolf Hitler's reign, once held torchlight processions through the gate. During past neo-Nazi demonstrations, police have not allowed participants to go through the Brandenburg Gate.

The demonstrators carried a banner at the head of their procession which read "Stop the Memorial" and some carried the old German red, white and black national flag – one which had the word "Skinheads" written on it.

Police said two arrests were made of people allegedly displaying banned symbols. Spreading Nazi propaganda is illegal in Germany. Authorities also stopped about 25 marchers from singing a Nazi song.

At the same time, a counter-demonstration was held by supporters of the memorial.

At several points during the neo-Nazi demonstration, opponents gathered in smaller groups and shouted "Nazis raus!" at the demonstrators, meaning "Nazis, get out!"

In the central city of Goettingen, a counter-demonstration against neo-Nazis drew about 2,000 participants. The city had been the planned site of a demonstration by the nationalist party, but authorities there had also banned it because of fears of violence.

Michel Friedman, a vice president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, called for "no tolerance for racists" at the Goettingen event.

Police there said 22 people, left and right extremists, were taken into custody.

German leaders last week held a ceremonial dedication for the Holocaust memorial, which will consist of a vast field of 2,700 close-set concrete slabs resembling stones in a graveyard. Thursday was also Germany's annual Day of Remembrance for Victims of Nazism, established in 1996 to coincide with the day Soviet soldiers liberated the Auschwitz death camp in Nazi-occupied Poland in 1945.

Parliament approved the memorial last year after 10 years of debate, the first in Germany dedicated solely to the murdered Jews of Europe.

Meanwhile, in Vienna last weekend, controversial Austrian rightist leader, Joerg Haider, said that he had reached agreement in coalition talks with the conservative People's Party on a halt to immigration.

In an interview with Austrian radio, Haider said the agreement "amounts to zero immigration." At the same time, the integration of foreigners living in Austria would be promoted, he said.

Haider rejected international criticism against him. "It is easy to withstand because all the points of criticism are without foundation," he said.

Israel's Foreign Minister David Levy, in the past, had threatened to suspend Israel's relations with Austria if Haider were to join the government.

The president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, Paul Spiegel, described Haider as "a wolf in sheep's clothing."

German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder told the Bild am Sonntag newspaper that "Austria should take care not to isolate itself politically."

The speaker of the European Parliament, Nicole Fontaine, said Austria could be excluded from the European Union if a rightist government violated human rights.

The president of Socialist International, Antonio Guterres, called on Christian Democrat parties to persuade the Austrian sister party not to forge a coalition with Haider.

"There are common values and principles in the European community that do not correspond to the views of Joerg Haider," Guterres said at a congress in Hamburg, Germany, of the Socialist International youth organization IUSY.

How one school tried to deal with bullying

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

One of the worst things that can happen to you in school is to be bullied. You feel as if you are helpless, as well as worthless.

There are many reasons that children are bullied. It may be because they are shorter than the other kids, or taller, smarter, less bright or less athletic. It may be for no reason at all – just a power trip for someone who can't think of any other way to be in control.

Bullying can also be directed against someone from a different country, race or religion. That can really be upsetting, because, after all, those are things you can't do anything about.

Paul Brown has been a teacher for a lot of years. He says that he "saw a lot of unfortunate stuff," and feels the best thing to do about it is to educate people when they are still young and impressionable. He wants to show them "what it feels like to be on the other side."

Brown has written a fine book called Shayna's Shadows (Educan Publishing, 1998), about bullying, and how one school tried to do something about it.

Shayna Rosen had to change from a Jewish day school to a public school because she was having difficulty dealing with the double load of subjects. Her neighbour, Gilbert, told her the teachers were mean, the homework was terrible, everyone failed the tests, and the kids were snobs. Needless to say, Shayna was terrified.

When she got to the new school, she was pleasantly surprised to find that the teachers were very supportive, she could do the work, and the kids were very nice. At least most of them.

A small group, led by none other than Gilbert, had the student body terrorized, especially the minorities – blacks, Chinese, Vietnamese and Jews.

When Shayna tried to fight back (she punched one of the group in the nose!) they turned on her, calling her cruel names, chasing her, stealing her Magen David necklace, and at one point forcing her to push an apple across the floor with her nose.

With the encouragement of the schoolteachers and administrators, as well as her rabbi and parents, Shayna takes a stand against the gang. The school begins an anti-racist program that includes making Gilbert attend a performance of The Diary of Anne Frank.

Most books for young people have a happy ending, making it look as if any problem can be solved in 200 pages. Shayna's Shadows is not like that. While Gilbert is made to at least think about what he has done, Brown makes no promises about his reforming.

Shayna's friend Nadira offers an insightful explanation for bigotry: "a lack of knowledge of others – you know, what they call stereotyping. Sometimes, though, it's just an excuse people use to distract themselves from their own problems, or maybe to blame others for their own problems."

While the book sounds serious, you will find a lot to enjoy in it, especially seeing Shayna change from a scared, insecure and easily intimidated girl to a determined person, with the courage to face her tormenters.

As well, the book is set in Toronto and is full of slices of local life, such as Skydome, Union Station, the old post office, Young People's Theatre, and, most important from a teenager's point of view, Yorkdale Shopping Centre.

Paul Brown has created a Web site to give you (and your parents and teachers) more information about himself, the book and dealing with bullying, anti-Semitism and bigotry. You might want to visit it at www.pathcom.com/~paulbro.

Shayna's Shadows is available at Batner's Bookstore; from Educan Publishing at 416-633-7124, 210 Armour Blvd., Toronto, M3H 1M7; by e-mail: paulbro@pathcom.com; or on the Internet at indigo.ca.

Still lifes, outdoors inspire local artist

By ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

RICHMOND HILL — Since arriving in Toronto from Israel in 1976, painter-photographer Asher Sadeh has found artistic inspiration in Ontario's natural settings.

To commemorate a quarter of a century of exploration in the genre, Sadeh will host a series of private showings of his works, starting on Feb. 6.

"As my 25th anniversary of living in Canada and the end of the century have fallen together, I thought it was an appropriate time to show my work once again and share with others the evolution over that period," says Sadeh, a teaching master at Georgian College's School of Design and Visual Arts in Barrie.

"Painting outdoor life had always interested me. When I was living in Israel, I painted landscapes highlighting the unique qualities that I saw in the terrain. After traveling across southern Ontario, I was drawn by the sheer magnetism of its scenery, particularly the lake areas, and I felt a strong desire to explore the richness of those details in my art."

Sadeh's body of work in still life, landscapes and flora from Ontario, as well as prior creations from Israel, will be available for private viewing, by appointment only. Shows will run in February and March from his studio.

Having exhibited more than 40 times in galleries in the United States, Israel and Canada, the 54-year-old artist says this showcase series is the first to bring together his entire body of work in this niche.

"What this presentation has allowed me to do is view my work in a totally new context. For instance, my photography in black and white versus colour has allowed me to capture scenery differently through effect. This is the first time that I have displayed both approaches at once, showing the full range of feelings those effects evoke."

The showcase will also provide a more formal public introduction of other genres he has explored, he added.

"In recent years, I have done more work in individual and grouped subjects, mostly in imaginary settings. This allowed me to delve into emotional states and frames of mind, between and about people."

While originally a native of New York, Sadeh has always been drawn to Israel. Seeing the potential to grow with the artist community then forming in Israel, Sadeh decided to settle there in 1973.

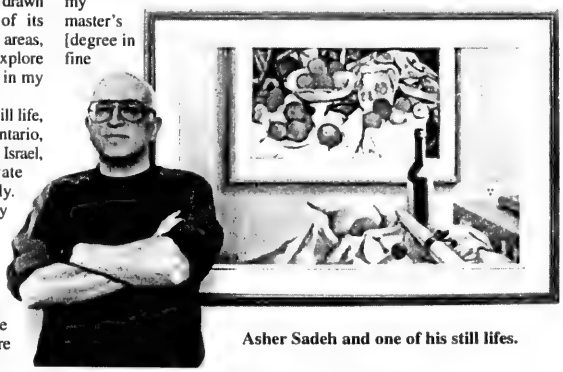
"In my late 20s, I had finished my master's [degree in fine arts from the Pratt Institute in New York] and wanted to live abroad," he says. "I felt ready for a change and some adventure, and Israel always appealed to me. It was an exciting place to be and the only country where I could live and work and be more than a visiting tourist."

The move to Israel proved to be the most formative in his development as an artist, he says.

Building on some initial experiences with the Jerusalem Post the year earlier, Sadeh became an assistant curator at the Israel Museum, where he designed and executed displays for Babylonian and Picasso exhibitions, among others.

His own work flourished, including paintings exhibited in group shows at the President's House in Jerusalem and a one-man show of paintings at the Jerusalem Artist's House the following year.

In 1976, Sadeh moved with his new wife to Canada when he was offered a teaching position at the Georgian College in painting and photography.



Asher Sadeh and one of his still lifes.

While starting a new life in the Toronto area, Sadeh says he sought to continue his bond with Israel, and joined the Organization of Israeli Artists.

Through that organization, he became involved with the Toronto Association of Israelis in Canada in the early 1990s, which asked him to create its logo – a Magen David and maple leaf design. Both groups adapted Sadeh's logo for their marketing.

For information about Sadeh's private showings, call 905-883-4541.

Devil's Arithmetic was designed to educate youngsters about Shoah

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Recently, I wrote a column highlighting the top Jewish videos of 1999. No sooner had I sent the column into the paper than I learned about another video that would certainly have been included in that list had I known about it earlier. But for many reasons, this video deserves an entire column of its own.

Last March, the American cable channel, Showtime, telecast a Holocaust film called The Devil's Arithmetic. This film is now available on video, but exclusively at Blockbuster.

The film has some excellent attributes and is well worth watching. It also has an interesting history.

The film is based on a similarly-titled book by Jane Yolen aimed at young adults. It was published in 1988 and has received a great deal of acclaim, has been read by many teenagers and young adults and has been placed on the curriculum of many high schools in the United States.

The story of The Devil's Arithmetic mixes a little Twilight Zone with a little of The Wizard of Oz. It deals with a spoiled, secular and uninterested Jewish teenager, Hannah Stern, who reluctantly attends a Passover seder at her Aunt Eva's house and is magically transplanted to 1941 Poland. There she witnesses and personally experiences the tragedy suffered by her family during the Holocaust.

The film suffered a lengthy gestation period. Upon reading the novel, screenwriter Robert J. Avrech

FEBRUARY LITERARY COLUMN

Welcome to Eye On Arts' first mid-winter all-books column.

The Jew in the Looking-Glass: Alberto Manguel, the celebrated Canadian writer and anthologist, included an interesting short piece, On Being Jewish, in his recent book, Into the Looking-Glass: Essays on Words and the World.

Manguel relates that his grandparents settled in a Baron Hirsch-sponsored colony in northern Argentina, "where gauchos with names like Izaak and Abraham called out to their cattle in Yiddish."

Because he and his immediate family were not crushed beneath the Nazi boot like the Jews of Europe, he questions whether the Holocaust as history belongs to him, as it does to the Jews collectively.

Further, he observes that the Jews are perpetually drawn into a dialectic of persecution that also often defines our identities, at least externally. Alas, he doesn't mention the many precepts generated by our ancient traditions that should theoretically define us to a far greater degree.

An astute critic, Manguel also looks at many other book-related topics in this engaging collection. (Vintage Canada, $19.95).

Jewish Science Fiction: How's this for tzuris? Lorinda, a nice Jewish girl, falls for an alien and runs off with him to another planet. Her father disowns her until he finds she's pregnant. Then he visits – only to find that his alien son-in-law has converted to Judaism and become a respected rabbi.

That's the essence of Carol Carr's short story, Look, You Think You've Got Problems, one of 13 stories in the entertaining collection, Wandering Stars: An Anthology of Jewish Fantasy & Science Fiction.

The Who-is-a-Jew? question also plays an important role in Robert Silverberg's The Dybbuk of Mazel Tov IV, in which the Kuniyaru, a group of aliens, want to be converted to Judaism. A generation later, they are fully integrated into Jewish life.

The anthology, which is a couple of years old, includes pieces from Isaac Asimov, Bernard Malamud and Isaac Bashevis Singer. The publisher, Jewish Lights Publishing, recently produced a sequel, More Wandering Stars: An Anthology of Outstanding Jewish Fantasy & Science Fiction. Both sell for $25.25.

Jewish Science: Was the Earth created in six days or 15 billion years? In Thinking About Creation: Eternal Torah and Modern Physics, Jewish physicist Andrew Goldfinger covers a lot of territory, from the Big Bang to the origin of light and matter, to the emergence of life itself.

This is a thoughtful, credible attempt to reconcile the Torah with modern science, while fully respecting the mysteries of creation. (Jason Aronson, Inc., $59.25).

Ghetto Literature: A recent scholarly work, Ghetto Writing, identified the 19th-century Bohemian writer Leopold Kompert as a pioneer in ghetto literature. Unfortunately, I could find none of his works in translation, but the search led me to The Jews of Barnow, a book of translated stories by Karl Emil Franzos, a later practitioner of the genre.

Writing in the late 19th century, Franzos is apparently an emancipated Jew looking back at what he sees as the odious, superstition-bound Jews who helped make the ghetto (in eastern Galicia) an even more miserable place. His is a brand of dark satire that infuses a slightly later work — English writer Israel Zangwill's Children of the Ghetto.

But whereas Zangwill wrote with a supercilious affection, Franzos seems to harbor an astonishing prejudice, evident (for instance) when he calls one of his characters, the Rabbi of Sadagora, "the most jealous opponent of light, the most fanatical supporter of the old dark faith."

Franzos writes with familiarity of Jewish life but with the antagonism of one who has left it behind forever. His collection was well received in his day, and sparked a debate in literary magazines like Blackwood's as to whether he was Jewish or Christian. My guess is that he converted.

The stories reveal much more, perhaps, than the author ever intended.

obtained an option on the screen rights. In order to sell the film project, Avrech pitched the story to every film studio in Hollywood and was rejected by all of them because the film executives felt no one was interested in a story about Jews in a concentration camp.

Avrech didn't give up. He wrote a script on spec and was about to pitch it to the film studios when Schindler's List was released. Now the film executives rejected the film because they felt there was room for only one Holocaust film.

Nothing happened until 1998. At that time Avrech was working with Mimi Rogers and mentioned The Devil's Arithmetic. Rogers, whose father is Jewish, asked to read the script. A few days later, Rogers asked permission to give the script to Dustin Hoffman, whom she felt might be interested in producing the film.

The result was that a deal was made with Showtime and the film was shot in Toronto and Lithuania.

Kirsten Dunst (Wag The Dog, Drop Dead Gorgeous and Dick) was cast as Hannah Stern. Mimi Rogers took the small role of Hannah's mother and Louise Fletcher plays Aunt Eva.

The story begins slowly. Hannah indulges in a little too much wine during the seder and when she opens the door for Eliyahu, she is magically transported into the Poland of 1941, just as the Nazi death machine was revving up its attempt to make Europe Judenrein. The film doesn't really get going until the roundup of the Jews and their deportation to a concentration camp.

Just as the novel is directed towards young people, the movie version of The Devil's Arithmetic is designed to educate young people about the Holocaust. This it does very well, although it might be a little too intense and too violent for children.

Dunst gives an excellent performance, once the preliminaries are out of the way. The rest of the cast, especially Brittany Murphy as Rivkah, do a good job under what must have been trying circumstances in Vilnius (Vilna), Lithuania.

This is a video that is worth making a special trip to rent, even if you also have to join another video store in order to do so.

Last Days an excellent documentary

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

When Steven Spielberg set up the Shoah Visual History Foundation, his aim was to record the testimony of Holocaust survivors and thus to preserve the memory of the Shoah.

One of the products of the Foundation was the Academy Award-winning documentary The Last Days, which will have its Canadian television premiere on The Passionate Eye, Feb. 6 at 7 p.m. ET

The Last Days focuses on the testimony of five Hungarian survivors now living in the United States, one of whom is Tom Lantos, a U.S. congressman.

Because Hungary was an ally of Germany in World War II, the country's Jews were initially spared the full effect of the Holocaust. The Hungarian puppet government did impose restrictions similar to those set up by Hitler in Germany prior to the outbreak of war. But it wasn't until the Germans were retreating from the advancing Soviets and occupied Hungary in March 1944 that Hungarian Jews began to be deported.

In fact, this might be the most brutal irony of the Shoah: that the retreating Germans, knowing they would eventually lose the war, hastened the execution of Jews in Europe. Many historians have commented on how many valuable resources the Germans diverted from the war effort for the transportation and execution of Jews and other Holocaust victims.

The Last Days is a brilliant documentary. Director and editor James Moll does a wonderful job of switching from archival camp footage to present-day scenes of the five survivors visiting the camps.

One especially good example of editing is the perfectly timed interview splicing that makes it appear the five people – in recounting their horrors – are telling one continuing story. And really they are. It might be five different tales, but it's all one story.

Alice Lok Cahanna recalls saying Shabbat prayers in the latrine during her incarceration in the concentration camp at Bergen Belsen.

Five tales: One story

When the deportation of the Hungarian Jews began in earnest following the Nazi occupation, it was probably one of the most efficient and brutal roundups in all of the war.

Within 12 weeks, most Hungarians had been rounded up and deported to Poland.

It is amazing to see how these survivors, almost 60 years later, can recall with such vivid clarity the horror that surrounded them: what possessions they carried when they were rounded up; the cattle trucks, the lineups at the camps and the doctors directing them to the left or the right; the bunks and latrines; the gas chambers and the ovens.

One woman recounts how the moment she stepped off the train at Auschwitz, she and her sister were separated from their mother who was deemed unfit to work. "By the time my sister and I were processed into the camp, my mother was no longer alive."

All the survivors in this documentary were filmed as they visited the campsite with their families. In an emotional scene, we see one woman explain to her son how they used to sing Shabbat prayers in the latrines.

One Dachau survivor is surprised to see how, 53 years later, the camp is still the still the way it was. "It's like it happened yesterday," he tells his son.

In another teary scene, a woman returns to her hometown, now in Ukraine, and sees the house she lived in still standing. She talks to her neighbours who still remember her and her sister and parents who perished.

"Did you talk about us when they took us away?" she wants to know.

I believe that in the years to come, documentaries like this one will do a better job of preserving the memory of those who died in the Holocaust than the black and white newsreel footage of the camps that we've all seen so often.

A survivor describing how horrible it was to part with a bathing suit that her father had given her goes a long way to humanize the Holocaust in a way a voice-over narration on footage of cattle trucks can't.

The Last Days succeeds because it takes the Shoah out of the history books and turns it into a personal account filled with teary emotion and hope.

Sixth Annual CJN Purim Art Contest

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 16. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small or too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, February 21, 2000. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: Children will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 3, 2000.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 16, 2000. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

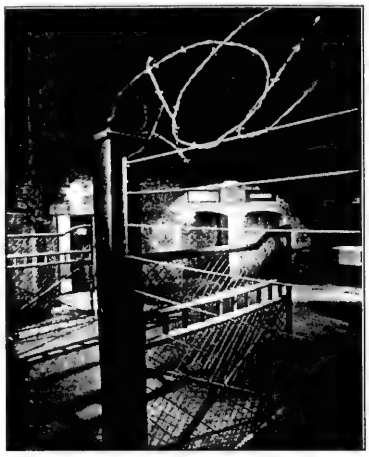
THE SIMON WIESENTHAL MUSEUM OF TOLERANCE

Imagine, for a moment, that you're having a meal in a southern California diner. The radio is tuned to a local shock-jock spouting racial diatribes.

Reacting to the radio's spewed hate, two strangers get into an argument. An armed security guard intervenes and accidentally shoots someone dead.



One of the museum's Holocasut displays.

This tragic scenario is the plot of a videodrama screened several times daily at the Museum of Tolerance, a unique Los Angeles institution. The purpose is to demonstrate to visitors how a dose of vocal venom, even from a radio, can spark an episode of violence.

The educational arm of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, the Museum of Tolerance is an innovative, high-tech institution that uses video terminals, slide projectors and computerized displays to sensitize visitors about the complex social mechanisms that lead to intolerance.

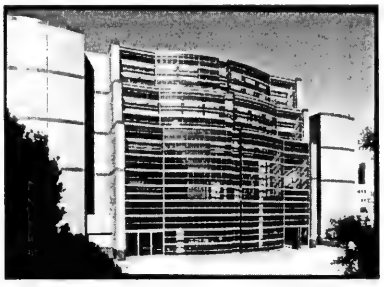
One of its premises – that almost all of us carry some form of prejudice within – is best exemplified by the choice of two doors at the entrance, one marked "prejudiced," the other "unprejudiced." Pointedly, the door for those who claim to be without prejudice cannot be opened.

Throughout this unique facility, the message seems to be that each person has personal responsibility for making their tiny corner of society a bit more of a tolerant place.

In the so-called Whisper Gallery, video screens present snippets of cocktail conversations brimming with prejudicial remarks that listeners in real life might leave unchallenged.

The object is to show that each of us has the power and responsibility to protest such utterances. In The Other America exhibit, some 250 American-based hate groups are pinpointed on a large map, suggesting where hateful speech can lead.

The museum traces the development of the American civil rights movement, splicing the words of Martin Luther King Jr. with visuals of Ku Klux Klan lynchings and other images, along with a spirited gospel rendition of Let My People Go. Further on, a historic timeline presents the history of intolerance around the world from 1700 to the present.



The Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles.

One of the facility's most powerful elements is the film In Our Time, which shows atrocities committed in Bosnia, Rwanda and elsewhere. Evoking a horrific crescendo of emotion, the film includes images of the Rabin assassination, the apartheid regime of South Africa and white supremacists on the march in America.

Although the museum devotes at least one third of its space to the Holocaust – displays include stark re-creations of the Warsaw Ghetto and a concentration camp – it frames the Jewish experience in Europe from 1933 to 1945 in a universalist context.

"We didn't want to present the Holocaust unaccompanied by other lessons," said Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Wiesenthal Centre. "This museum says: 'You may not be Jewish and you may not be a Nazi, but you have a stake in this. Because hatred was not banished with Adolf Hitler – it outlived him.'"

The museum is more than a West-Coast version of the extraordinary U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. But like its eastern cousin, it is geared towards education. While vacationers may consider anything that smacks of self-improvement as an ordeal, those who visit the museum will be quickly drawn in by its immediacy and its imperative message of self-responsibility.

In part funded by the Belzberg family of Vancouver, the $55-million museum has received about two million visitors to date, many of them schoolchildren. It is located in the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, 9760 West Pico Blvd., Los Angeles. 310-553-9036. Adults $8.

Business Profile

Animation firm is a force to be reckoned with

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A drab building bordering on the ugly, it sits squarely in a depressed, semi-industrial area of western Toronto, about a kilometre from Lake Ontario. Appearances, though, can be deceiving. Inside its dimly-lit bowels creative juices flow uninhibitedly and imaginations run free.

This is the unlikely headquarters of Nelvana, the world's leading independent animation production company.

And if you're not familiar with its slew of television shows and its cast of cartoon characters, just ask your children. They will almost certainly know.

From popular programs like the The Care Bears and The Adventures of Tintin to endearing characters such as Rupert, Franklin, Little Bear and Babar, Nelvana is a corporate force to be reckoned with in the booming business of children's entertainment.

Nearly 30 years old, Nelvana is run by Michael Hirsh and two partners, Patrick Loubert and Clive Smith, who have been with him since the outset.

Hirsh, the son of Holocaust survivors from Poland and Belgium, oversees Nelvana's distribution and licencing divisions.

As the person responsible for bringing Nelvana to the forefront of the international television market, he has been remarkably successful, especially of late.

Last August, around the time he acquired the North American TV distribution and merchandising licencing rights to a Japanese animation series titled Cardcaptor, Hirsh signed a $40 million contract with the Public Broadcasting System (PBS) in the United States to produce six series for its fall 2000 season.

"Without question, it is the single largest deal we've done," said Hirsh, pointing out that it marks PBS' entry into Saturday morning cartoon programming. The PBS shows will be based on works such as Maurice Sendak's Seven Little Monsters and Rosemary Wells' Timothy Goes To School.

And in the waning days of 1999, Hirsh signed a contract with RTV Family Entertainment in Germany valued at approximately $32 million. It was the biggest agreement Nelvana had ever negotiated outside North America. "This is terrific for us," said Hirsh, who was nurtured on a diet of Bugs Bunny, Mickey Mouse and Superman cartoons in movie theatres.

For Hirsh, 1998 was similarly a good year. Nelvana won the right to produce the entire Saturday morning cartoon lineup for the CBS network, a coup by any yardstick.

As well, Nelvana bought Kids Can Press Ltd. Children's publishing is a lucrative business, worth over $1.4 billion in Canada and the United States. "This acquisition," explained Hirsh, "provided a solid base for future growth in this sector, and was an important step for us in building a more integrated family entertainment company."

Hirsh, whose duties take him all around the globe, was born in Brussels in 1948. His father, Jack, was a prisoner in Auschwitz and at other concentration camps. After the war, he was a manufacturer of bags, then slippers. Hirsh's mother, Tauba, was hidden in a Catholic nursery during the war,

"My parents knew each other before the war, and were married in 1947. We immigrated to Canada in 1951, following my father's sister and only surviving close family member, Gertie. We moved to New York City in 1960, but I returned to Canada in 1966." His parents and two sisters, Lily and Susan, still live in the United States

At York University, Hirsh majored in philosophy and turned out underground student movies. He and Loubert started a small production company, Laff Arts, with the intention of building a studio. "It didn't happen at Laff Arts, but eventually came to fruition at Nelvana."

Their big break came when they stumbled upon a cache of World War II-vintage Canadian comic books featuring characters like Johnny Canuck and Nelvana of the Northern Lights.

Michael Hirsh oversees Nelvana's distribution and licencing divisions.

After purchasing the rights, they made a children's documentary for CBC TV. The film, in turn, spawned a coffee-table book on Canadian comics and a National Gallery of Canada travelling tour of comic book art.

For the next few years, Nelvana churned out a mix of documentaries and dramatic live-action films, including Christmas Two Step and The Cosmic Christmas, Nelvana's breakthrough project.

It brought the Toronto-based firm, with offices in London, Paris and Los Angeles, to the attention of Hollywood director George Lucas, who commissioned Nelvana to create an animated piece for his 1978 Star Wars TV special.

In 1983, Nelvana released Rock & Roll, a fully animated feature for the young adult market. Though a critical success, it was a financial failure. "We found ourselves in a difficult period as a result of going over-budget on it," noted Hirsh.

Bankruptcy apparently never threatened Nelvana, notwithstanding the fact that 1983 was its blackest year. To keep its head above the water, Nelvana accepted service jobs. "We earned our way out of debt through productions like Inspector Gadget, our first animated series."

While working off its debt, Nelvana made The Care Bears, its first really big hit. Until Steven Spielberg's An American Tail, The Care Bears was the highest grossing non-Disney animated feature in history.

In 1994, Nelvana went public, a milestone which "facilitated significant growth," said Hirsh, whose wife, Elaine Waisglass, is an independent filmmaker and artist. (She is an executive producer of Little Miracles on the Life channel).

Hirsh, the father of two boys, is clearly pleased with Nelvana's achievements so far.

"We were the first company in Canada to enjoy commercial success with animation. We were the first Canadian company in our field to sell a series directly to an American network. We are the first to deliver an entire slate of programming to a network for all its genre productions."

Nelvana, with 500 employees today, has licenced its shows to more than 180 countries, including Israel and Arab states.

"Our cartoons are popular throughout the Middle East," said Hirsh.

And, he hastened to add, Nelvana characters are now represented in all major product categories: home videos, toys, games, apparel, stationary and publishing.

Looking ahead, Hirsh said that Nelvana is focused on growth. "Franklin and Little Bear are taking off as merchandisable characters. They are enjoying considerable retail success. We are concentrating on acquisitions to significantly increase our non-production and distribution business."

Meanwhile, business has never been better.

Nelvana achieved record results in 1998. Net earnings shot up by 75 percent to $8.6 million from $4.9 million the year before. Revenue increased 34 percent to $75 million from $56 million. (Figures for 1999 will be published in March.)

Hirsh and his partners have certainly found the formula for success.

New developments in field of eye care explored

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Several doctors lectured recently on new developments in the field of eye care.

Experts addressed a Mount Sinai Hospital Healthy Living audience at the Leah Posluns theatre. The lecture was sponsored by the hospital, the Bathurst Jewish Centre and the Jewish Women's Federation.

Dr. Jeffrey Hurwitz, opthalmologist-in-chief at the hospital said that patients should decide what cosmetic eyelid surgery they need, and not just follow recommendations of a surgeon.

"Surgeons should let patients decide," said Hurwitz.

Mount Sinai Hospital has made such strides in oculoplastic surgery in the past 14 years that it has gained an international reputation in the field, Hurwitz said.

However, decisions about how much fatty tissue under or above the eye is to be removed, or how much a narrowed eye should be opened, should be made by the patient, he said.

Dr. Michael Brent said that new photodynamic therapy for macular degeneration, a leading cause of decreased vision in the elderly, holds great promise for the future.

The new technology which will make the therapy possible has been approved in just one other country so far but its approval in Canada is expected soon, he said.

Patients with age-related macular degeneration should stop smoking, lower their blood pressure, wear sunglasses, and eat lots of green vegetables in their diet, he advised.

Only 10 percent of macular degeneration cases are suffering from the most severe form of the disease, Brent said, adding that victims rarely go completely blind.

Brent said that eye exercises cannot prevent or alleviate the disease.

Dr. Ray Stein discussed the use of lasers in cataract surgery.

In the last six months several companies have introduced methods of using lasers in cataract surgery.

"There is probably no advantage with laser," he said, relating how present methods have reduced infections and complications.

Stein is the grandson of Dr. Max Bochner, the late well known eye doctor.

Asked about the new laser operation to end near-sightedness, Stein said it works best on patients with lower astigmatism.

His patients are given a choice of the type of lens they want after the operation but a majority of them want a foldable lens.

According to Dr. Fred Feldman the treatment of glaucoma has greatly improved.

"We have better medication than we have had and vision can be saved," he said.

Dr. Robert Pashby said that babies can't see small objects because children don't get 20/20 vision until they are three years old.

He favours preschool screening every two years for children with vision problems.

Pashby whose father, Dr. Tom Pashby, invented the helmet hockey players now wear also said that eye-related "accidents in sports are entirely preventable."

In the past year, only five Canadians were blinded by accidents, and none of them was wearing a helmet. The average age of the victims was 28, compared with an average age of 14 of the 45 blinded in 1972-73.

"We have licked the problem with kids," he said.

Book explores specialists' role

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new book explains why specialists sometimes ask patients the same questions they've already answered for their family doctors.

In What Your Doctor Really Thinks, internist Dr. Ian Blumer says the specialist has to have his own history of the patient because the doctor-patient interview is subjective and is very important in making a diagnosis.

In the book published by The Dundurn Group ($16.99, paper), Blumer reveals that after he asks a patient to go into an examining room to disrobe, he often takes the time to consult medical books if he is unsure of the diagnosis.

It is one of the secrets that will rile his colleagues but may delight his patients, he writes.

In private practice in Ajax, Ont., Blumer is also medical advisor to the Charles H. Best Centre for Diabetes for Children and Youth in Oshawa.

Blumer, who grew up in Montreal, is married to a rheumatologist. They have three children.

In the book, he says doctors order so many tests when they are unsure of a diagnosis to protect themselves against malpractice suits.

And he makes no apology for giving medical colleagues preferential treatment for their ills, as a fact of life. At the same time, he warns against "corridor consultations" by fellow doctors, writing that a regular sit-down interview is necessary.

He gives a remarkably candid overview of the problem of doctors having sexual relations with their patients. Though he is personally against such relations and gives a list of rules that physicians should follow to avoid them, Blumer writes that he can understand why it happens.

Knowing, he writes, that many patients like to play doctor, he lists a number of symptoms for diseases as varied as brain tumours or depression, and then gives the probable correct diagnosis.

He stresses, however, that people should not buy the book to get a diagnosis for their own symptoms because, in every case, this should be done by the patient's doctor.

Israel & the Jewish World

Disputes at the Jerusalem Post

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Every time Tom Rose, chief executive and publisher of the Jerusalem Post, leaves his office at the newspaper, he passes by a bright yellow sign that screams, "Tom Rose Go Home."

Rose jokes that he has no illusions about what his employees think of him.

Many journalists at the newspaper believe that what they call the ruthless managerial tactics Rose has deployed since joining the newspaper in 1998 could spell disaster for an institution that has been Israel's venerable voice to the outside world for decades.

Yet Rose remains sanguine when discussing plans to wrap up a labour dispute and push through sweeping job cuts. At the same time, he is trying to lead the paper past a turbulent time during which two senior editors have recently resigned.

"There really has not been a dramatic shakeup here in a long time," Rose said, talking about plans to streamline the financially troubled newspaper. "The issue is really grow or die – and we choose the former."

The recent unrest is the latest tumultuous chapter at the Post since it was taken over by Hollinger International, the Canadian newspaper conglomerate, in 1989.

Following the takeover, as the newspaper's editorial line shifted from left toward center-right, more than two dozen journalists resigned.

Many left to create the Jerusalem Report, today a bimonthly magazine that also has been bought out by Hollinger to bolster an English-language media powerhouse in Israel.

Yet the real trigger for the Post's situation today is competition.

For decades since its founding in 1932, the Jerusalem Post, known in prestate days as the Palestine Post, was a monopoly in the market for English speakers in Israel, today totalling about 150,000.

But in 1997, Ha'aretz, a leading Hebrew daily newspaper, launched an English-language version together with the International Herald Tribune.

Both newspapers have strengths and weaknesses. Many readers consider Ha'aretz to be a premier source of scoops and higher quality analysis. But as a translated newspaper it is often not reader-friendly and is riddled with errors. It also has a left editorial line.

The Jerusalem Post is considered by many to be Israel's English-language journal of record, though not always at the cutting edge of the political and business news fronts.

According to Rose, its editorial line is strategically positioned at the center-right to capture the large number of right-wing English speakers in Israel without alienating readers of other political persuasions.

However, the recent resignations of centrists Hirsh Goodman as editorial vice chairman after nearly two years, and David Makovsky as executive editor after just five months, have led some observers to wonder whether the Post is poised to shift further rightward.

Meanwhile, Rose is faced with labour problems that are as daunting as the editorial issues.

At the end of 1999, Post journalists who were on a collective union contract launched a series of demonstrations against Rose's plans to change their contracts, which expired last month. They said the changes, which would make it easier to dismiss union employees, would leave them vulnerable to management and compromise their editorial standards.

Post insiders say up to 35 percent of the newspaper's 55 editorial employees may find themselves off the team, and union members are believed to be blacklisted.

Rose defends the job cuts, saying the newspaper spends unsustainably high amount of money on bloated contracts to union journalists.

"The whole issue is how to best position this paper in business for the future," Rose said.

Post insiders say the plan may also include new agreements to buy outside content such as the recent launch of pages from the Wall Street Journal, and possibly, an agreement with an overseas Jewish newspaper such as the Forward.

But while some nonunion journalists think the cuts could position the newspaper for a brighter future, many remain completely confused by the strategy and say the plans remain shrouded in a thick fog.

Rose's success or failure in clearing up that fog and leading the Post into the new millennium could impact not only the newspaper's employees and reputation, but on thousands of English-reading news junkies from Israel and abroad alike.

Eight-year-old spins fast and jumps high

By MICHAEL NOBLE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jordan Epstein is eight years old and he likes to skate – a lot.

He's on the ice seven days a week; early in the morning; after school; during school; in the middle of summer vacation. It could be a free skate, group classes, individual tutoring, choreography, strength and flexibility training. For Halloween he dressed up as Elvis Stojko. For his birthday he had a skating party. The kid likes to skate.

Jordan Epstein

And why wouldn't he? From the moment he first laced up his blades less than two years ago, Jordan and mother Sandy were told "Jordan belongs on the ice." He advanced quickly from recreational skating to competitive events and won his first competition in Bowmanville in November 1998. Since then he has won six medals in four events, including three golds at the Central Ontario Sectionals in April 1999.

Even at age eight, Jordan can spin fast and jump high. He is fearless and disciplined. Coach Laura Harris-Lev Tov has told the Epsteins that Jordan has all the ingredients to become an international star. He already talks about participating in the 2010 Olympics and how "I've always dreamed about being the next Elvis Stojko."

His skating success has made Jordan a local celebrity in his Grade 3 class at USDS in Richmond Hill. After competitions, he brings his medals and a tape of his two-minute performance to show to his class. But medals or no medals, he is still expected to finish his homework.

Young athletes are famous for being either uncomfortable pawns or arrogant brats, but Jordan is neither. His attitude is not "I'll never be good enough" or "I'm the greatest" but a more innocent, "look what I can do."

He'll happily lay out his medals on the family's dining room table along with pictures from various competitions. He proudly shows a video of a winning routine and he even demonstrates an axle on the living room carpet.

When talking about the constant pushing and criticism from coaches or the odd misstep on the ice, it's mother Sandy who seems to be bothered the most. Playing with his Pokemon, Jordan says matter-of-factly that this is the nature of the sport. He and his mom agree skating has helped him develop a good work ethic and self-confidence.

There is some extra discomfort in being a boy in what many see as a girl's sport. For now, Jordan is the only boy of his age at his skating club. Off-ice socializing is minimal and Jordan is often on the receiving end of a lot of questions about picking up a stick and playing hockey like "boys are supposed to do."

On the other hand, being a figure skater also means that when Elvis Stojko sees you and your brother (who has since moved from figure skating to hockey) take the ice, your hero takes notice. He says "boys!" flashes your mom a smile and a thumbs up and then takes a picture with your family – and nobody else's. Then Elvis, like you, goes into his umpteenth hour of practice, tries to perfect his impossible moves and thinks about the medals of the future and past.

Australians still angry at MWU

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Australian leaders continue to criticize the Maccabi World Union long after release of a report that the MWU hoped would "set the record straight."

In a Dec. 29 submission to a Knesset special committee looking into the bridge collapse, Australian Jewish leader Peter Wertheim was scathing in his critique of top MWU leaders: "Messrs. Bakalarz and Netanel failed in their moral responsibility to the athletes whom they themselves had invited to participate in the 15th Maccabiah Games in Israel," he said.

Wertheim, president of the New South Wales Jewish Board of Deputies and a vice-president of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, said "the organization of the Games was a penny-pinching exercise from beginning to end. In order to save money, an inadequate bridge was built and inadequate insurance cover was arranged for the athletes."

Wertheim told the special committee that the Australian Jewish community has not backed away from its demands that Bakalarz and Netanel resign, pending the outcome of the Knesset's inquiry; that the victims receive "just compensation;" and that safety and operational procedures in future games be reviewed.

"The position of the official roofbodies of Australian Jewry continues to be that our community will not participate at the next Games unless the demands I have outlined are satisfied," Wertheim said.

Meanwhile, Ha'aretz newspaper in Israel reported in late December that departing Australian Ambassador Ian Wilcock remained angry at the MWU two years after the bridge disaster.

"The MWU is to blame, not the Israeli government," he said. "I appreciate the work of the Israeli courts...and the Knesset...

"There is a strong view among the Australian Jewish community that Australia should not participate in the next Games unless certain things are done. In addition to paying compensation, safety arrangements must be made and certain resignations submitted," said Wilcock, who was at the Games' opening ceremonies when the bridge collapsed.

The MWU responded by noting "Maccabi recognized the importance of speedy financial assistance and makes efforts to do so, despite MWU's own scant resources...

"Key Maccabiah executives resigned immediately...Outrage at the obvious chain of failures in this tragedy is shared by all Maccabi members and by all Israelis...

"A committee advised by the former head of the Mossad is currently looking into safety and security concerns for the next Maccabiah," the MWU stated.

Bridge collapse ruling soon

by the Israeli media and others, even before all the facts are in.

Maccabi Australia – as a condition for it to continue to be a member of the MWU – demanded that Yoram Eyal, chair of the 15th Maccabiah Games' organizing committee, and Ittamar Herman, who chaired the opening ceremonies, resign their positions.

But MWU president Ronald Bekalarz and its chair, Uzi Netanel, have stayed on in the face of similar demands. Netanel, however, did step down as chair of the International Maccabiah Committee.

Those on trial at the moment include Eyal; Micha Bar-Ilan, the bridge's engineer; sub-contractors Baruch Caragula and Yehoshua Ben-Ezra; and Adam Mishori, whose company, Irgunit, was hired by the Games' organizing committee to construct the bridge.

In his report to the MWU plenary last May, Salomon, who was a member of an MWU delegation that travelled to Australia about a year ago to meet with the Jewish community, expressed his faith in Israel's judicial process.

In his report, Salomon stressed the importance of due process."We have to accept the presumed innocence of those who have been accused until and unless they are proven guilty.

"Yet I think we have been painted with guilt right from the start. Yoram Eyal is one of the defendants, and I believe his defence has been well presented. We certainly hope he will be acquitted, and we will continue to monitor the proceedings and provide reports to the board members abroad."

Salomon's report was also critical of a special Knesset committee investigating the tragedy, which he appeared before; he told the plenary he felt this committee appeared biased right from the start.

He said the committee chair, MK Micha Goldman, called on Netanel and Bekalarz to resign, "before we had even a chance to be heard."

Salomon said only a few of the committee's nine members were actually in the committee room at any given time to hear his testimony or that of other MWU officials.

"If nine people are going to make a decision, I would like to know where the rest of them were because they didn't hear me," he said.

"I travelled from Canada especially for that meeting, [But] they weren't there to hear what I had to say.

"Ronald [Bekalarz] referred to the meeting as a 'kangaroo court' ...We've been attacked for using this term, but I am not ashamed to say today that the way that hearing was held, that is exactly what it was."

In the interview with The CJN, Salomon said the MWU was reluctant to have the debate over the bridge affair take place in the Israeli media.

There was a "tremendous campaign against the MWU," he said. "We didn't want to fight it out within the press.

"Our MWU people did everything they possibly could after the tragedy," he said. "If I thought everything that's been printed in the papers was true, I wouldn't stay around for a day."

Stories that touch the heart

Tempting Logic

A yeshiva student from Vilna pledged to strengthen his spiritual fortitude by learning to resist temptation.

His first test came soon.

One day, he found himself alone in the yeshiva dining room, with a large piece of cake beckoning to him.

Taking a deep breath, the student concentrated on overcoming his hunger, despite the pit in his stomach that seemed to grow larger by the moment. Minutes passed. To his great relief, the student began to notice that his hunger for the once tantalizing slice had all but disappeared.

He thought to himself: "Look at what I have achieved. Not only have I managed to avoid eating this piece of cake, but I have even vanquished my desire for the food! I have truly reached a most high level of spirituality. How virtuous am I!" He beamed to himself.

Suddenly, the student turned pale. "I may have conquered one vice, but I fear I have now engaged another vice! Look how arrogant I have become over my restraint! And for certain, arrogance is at least as great a sin as gluttony! Oh, the evil impulse never sleeps!"

But then the student smiled: "Ah, I have the solution. I have already managed to conquer my desire to eat the piece of cake. Now I have to conquer my arrogant nature. If I now, indeed, have the piece of cake, I will also overcome my pride for not having eaten the piece the cake."

And with that leap of Lithuanian logic, the student devoured his prey in one zealous mouthful.

Moral: In Judaism, if you try hard enough, you can have your piece of cake…and eat it too!

Put Your Best Face Forward

Rabbi Israel Salanter, the famed Lithuanian sage and moralist, once saw a man walking down the street with a pained expression on his face.

"What troubles you?" he asked the man. "Has life been unkind to you. Has someone mistreated you?"

Replied the man: "No, Rabbi. This being the period just before Rosh Hashanah, I am contemplating my sins. And that is why I do not look happy."

Said Rabbi Salanter: "In the Talmud we learn about two concepts relating to property: Reshut Harabim (the public domain) and Reshut Hayachid (the private domain). Most of the civil rulings and restrictions concerning business and damages pertain to actions in the public domain. But regarding the private domain, you will find few regulations, since what is done in one's own home usually has no discernible impact on the public.

"These same concepts also apply to a person's spiritual state," the rabbi continued. "Your heart is a Reshut Hayachid, your private domain. If you want to feel sad on the inside over past deeds, that is your right. Over this we may make no claim.

"But your face, your outer demeanour, that is Reshut Harabim (the public domain), because your exterior has an impact on the spirit of others. In this instance, we may insist that for the public good, you display a cheerful expression."

Vegetable recommendations: chilled iceberg and Boston lettuce, baby corn, slivered ginger root, shredded carrots, sliced mushrooms, bean sprouts and some mandarin orange sections. For a heartier salad, you could include marinated or grilled tofu, grilled sliced chicken breast, almost any variety of cooked Oriental noodles.

- 1 small onion
- 2-3 garlic cloves
- 3/4 cup soya sauce
- 1/3 cup lemon juice
- 1/2 to 1 cup water
- up to 3 cups vegetable oil
- 1/2 cup sesame seeds

Blend all ingredients except oil & sesame seeds in a food processor. Add oil in a thin stream until mixture thickens. If too thick, thin with a bit more water. Garnish with sesame seeds.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Jack, my husband of 18 years, is probably the worst procrastinator I have ever met. When he has to do something, he always waits until the very last minute and then rushes through whatever it is. Often, everyone in the house becomes involved because he doesn't leave himself enough time to get the job done.

He has always been this way and I have tried to change him, without success.

I have two wonderful children. Sheri, 10, and Adam, 14.

Adam has now taken over his father's horrible habit, and his school work is suffering. He has three weeks to complete a project and waits until the last minute to try to whip off something that resembles the assignment he was given.

His marks aren't bad, but I can't help feeling that he could have excellent marks if he put a bit more effort into his work and didn't wait till the last minute to do everything.

When either Jack or I confront him, his stock answer is "Dad works like this too."

I'm at my wit's end and Jack has said to him, "You can be like this when you're an adult, but right now you do as you're told." What a ridiculous comment.

I'm ready to kill both of them. Any suggestions?

At My Wit's End

Dear At My Wit's End

Seeing that Jack is an adult and has managed to get through his whole life this way, let's see if we can do something with Adam.

Procrastination can be very annoying to a person who is not a procrastinator. For you it's hard to understand because it seems so easy to fix. "Just do it!" You have to realize that the last minute is a very powerful motivator.

There are many issues that may go with this problem: fear, perfectionism, laziness, lack of organization, motivation, and the list goes on.

If you can get Adam, or even his teachers, to keep you informed of assignments, you can help him organize his thoughts, materials and time, and start listing ideas and goals on paper. Break down big assignments into smaller manageable ones. Reward him with a lot of positive reinforcement. A pat on the back goes a long way.

If he gets good results after a few tries, you may be able to break this behavioural pattern.

Iran steps up arms to Hezbollah

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Weapons shipments from Iran to Hezbollah, which pass through Damascus, have been increased recently, apparently with the aim of preparing Hezbollah for a spate of several weeks of intensive fighting in southern Lebanon.

The accelerated pace of arms shipments would be impossible without the authorization and blessing of Damascus.

The shipments, which include arms, equipment and ammunition, are usually flown by jumbo jet from Iran to Damascus airport. From there, the munitions are moved by trucks, though not in convoys, into Lebanon for delivery to Hezbollah.

The Shi'ite organization then disperses the weapons and other items to storehouses in various parts of southern Lebanon, usually in populated areas.

Weapons pass through Syria

Israel has not yet succeeded in hitting these hiding places or intercepting the trucks carrying the arms and ammunition from Damascus to Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Even though Hezbollah's storerooms have already been filled with Katyusha rockets and ammunition, the rate of the shipments was intensified in the midst of Israel's negotiations with the Syrians and in the wake of repeated declarations from Israeli leaders that the IDF will withdraw from Lebanon by July.

The additional shipments are the underlying factor in the assessment that Damascus effectively agrees with Tehran on the need to provide Hezbollah with a longer-term combat capability.

The assumption is that Syria is taking into account the possibility of another intensive military confrontation in southern Lebanon, and therefore wants Hezbollah to be able to fight consecutively for several weeks and not just for a few days, as was the case in the past.

Damascus seems to be convinced that Israel will be deterred from responding vigorously because of the fear of an attack on the Galilee.

IDF MOURNINGS IN SOUTH LEBANON: In the last two weeks five IDF soldiers have been killed in South Lebanon. Last week Yedidya Gefen, 20, was killed and seven soldiers wounded in an ambush that followed the explosion of a planted roadside bomb. In the far left photo, IDF soldiers watch two weeks ago, a helicopter carrying their wounded comrades to Rambam hospital in Haifa. Below is the funeral procession for 21-year-old Staff Sgt. Lior Niv in Tel Aviv. Fellow paratroopers follow the coffin. Niv and two other soldiers were killed when their army base suffered a direct hit from a missile fired by pro-Iranian and Syrian backed Hezbollah. Below right, Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Barak kneels as he tries to comfort Sosh Malcha, mother of Staff Sgt. Tsachi Malcha, 21, who was killed along with Lior Niv and Maj. Tidhar Templehoff, 23. Earlier, Staff Sgt. Raphael Zangwill, 24, newly arrived from Latvia, was killed.

CANADA

Rabbi Sentenced

MONTREAL — A 74-year-old Orthodox rabbi has been sentenced to six months home detention for smuggling drugs to prison inmates he was ministering to in upstate New York. Rabbi Eli Gottesman, who maintains residences in Montreal and Ogdensburg, N.Y., was sentenced Jan. 27 in Binghamton, N.Y.

Groups Get Together

WINNIPEG — Representatives from 46 local Jewish organizations and agencies gathered last week to explore how to make communal planning more inclusive. The day-long gathering explored the implementation of representation from a broader range of organizations on the local federation's planning committee.

ISRAEL

Jerusalem's Boundaries

JERUSALEM — Israel's deputy defence minister last week suggested Jerusalem's boundaries could be expanded to accommodate Palestinian hopes for a presence in the city. Ephraim Sneh's comments came as Israeli and Palestinian negotiators convened for a second day of intensive talks aimed at reaching an outline of a final peace agreement.

Your Bubbie Was Right...

JERUSALEM — Two Israeli doctors recently nominated chicken soup to the World Health Organization's list of essential drugs. The two physicians referenced the medical writings of Maimonides and the Talmud, as well as a Web site address with chicken soup recipes and a medical journal article in which the staple of Ashkenazi Jews was cited for increasing "nasal mucous velocity." But they admitted that there was no "significant statistical evidence" to support their claim.

Firefighting Robot

JERUSALEM — Israeli and Palestinian students are working together to build a firefighting robot. The robot, part of a program to foster Israeli-Palestinian coexistence through education, is expected to be able to locate a fire in an apartment building and extinguish it.

WORLD

Non-Jews Buy Kosher

NEW YORK — Non-Jews comprise the majority of buyers of kosher food and products in the United States, a new study says. Muslims, Seventh-day Adventists, vegetarians and the lactose-intolerant now constitute 80 percent of the U.S. kosher market, according to the New York firm, Integrated Marketing. Jews make up 20 percent of buyers. In response to the huge demand for kosher foods, Manischewitz has doubled the number of products it offers. The Muslim population of the United States has grown from an estimated 4.8 million in 1990 to 6.7 million this year.

Newspaper Denies Shoah

DAMASCUS — A recent edition of the official Syrian newspaper Tishrin denied the Holocaust. The paper said Israel "created the Holocaust myth to blackmail and terrorize the world's intellectuals and politicians." It added Israel is now "acting in the style of the Holocaust in its treatment of the Arabs" to "receive more money from Germany and other Western establishments on the pretext of compensation for the Holocaust." In response, Likud MK Danny Naveh said Prime Minister Ehud Barak's silence in the face of the article "puts the State of Israel to shame."

Judaic Conference

MOSCOW — A three-day conference on Judaic studies near here last week assembled 400 scholars from around the world. The annual conference was organized by Sefer, the Centre for the University Teaching of Jewish Civilization in Russia.

Death March Marked

MOSCOW — A ceremony was held near a Russian town last week to mark a Nazi death march that took place 55 years ago. Mourners erected a plaque commemorating the thousands of Jews killed by Nazi machine guns at a mine near Yantarny on the Baltic Sea.

Jewish Shops Attacked

ROME — Vandals in Italy spray-painted swastikas, Stars of David and anti-Semitic slogans on about 15 Jewish-owned shops in Rome in an attack coinciding with ceremonies marking the 55th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz. The attack, in a neighbourhood that is home to many Jews, took place late last week.

Latvian Promise

STOCKHOLM — Latvia's president last week promised to investigate the cases of 41 alleged Latvian war criminals suspected of participating in the murder of thousands of Jews during World War II. Vaira Vike-Freiberga made the promise in a meeting with the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Efraim Zuroff in Stockholm, where both attended an international Holocaust educational conference.

CJC Urges Caution as Museum Weighs Hitler Car Sale

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress is urging the Canadian War Museum to "exercise good judgment and discretion" if it decides to proceed with plans to sell the limousine that once belonged to Adolf Hitler. The sleek, black Mercedes has been part of the museum's regular display since 1970.

"We would not object to seeing the car leave the control of the museum," said CJC president Moshe Ronen in a statement. "But we firmly believe conditions must be applied that would restrict the sale to a museum or other institution that will use it for historical value, and not to glorify Hitler or Nazism."

Reports last week suggested the museum was considering selling the car, which could fetch as much as $20 million at auction.

But the museum's director, historian Jack Granatstein, conceded there would be a dilemma if the sale goes ahead.

He said it would be satisfying if the sale of Hitler's car would help build a new home for the museum. The federal government is currently debating whether to allocate $59 million for a new museum.

On the other hand, the museum runs the risk of having the car falling into the hands of neo-Nazis or other extremists because it is such a powerful symbol of evil.

Last week, the museum was besieged with calls and e-mails from Canadians who were unanimously opposed to selling the car.

Canada's response to UN blasted as shameful

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is being hypocritical when it comes to upholding and advancing human rights, and now stands to lose credibility on the world stage, say Jewish communal officials in the wake of last week's response by Ottawa to the United Nations on the question of funding religious-based schools in Ontario.

In effect, the federal government said that since education falls under provincial jurisdiction, its hands are tied. And since Ontario is refusing to extend public dollars to private, faith-based schools, the matter is more or less closed.

"It's an embarrassment to Canada," fumed Anne Bayefsky, the lawyer who argued the funding case before the UN's human rights committee.

"It's astonishing there would be any suggestion by the federal government that they do not have the responsibility to ensure compliance with Canada's international obligations," Bayefsky told The CJN. Canada's response "in no way leaves Ottawa or Ontario off the hook."

Last November, the UN's human rights committee found in favour of Toronto parent Arieh Waldman, who argued his rights were being violated because he had to pay to educate his sons in Jewish day schools, while still having to pay public education taxes. The world body found that Ontario discriminates by funding Catholic schools and not other faith-based education systems.

It gave Canada until Feb. 3 to say how the situation would be remedied. The ruling, however, was not legally binding.

Canada's response, delivered in Geneva last Thursday, acknowledges the country is a signatory to the 1976 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, "and takes the rights set out in the treaty very seriously."

The government said it sought the "co-operation" of Ontario in crafting a solution. "However,

An artistic defiance

The year is 2000, some 55 years after the end of the Second World War and still there is no rest for the truth.

Will there ever be?

At this very moment in a courtroom in London, England, "historical truth" itself is on trial.

That is how the editors of The Atlantic Monthly in this month's issue (February 2000), describe the significance of the defamation trial launched by David Irving against Deborah Lipstadt, an American historian, for calling him "one of the most dangerous spokespersons for Holocaust denial."

The article, ominously titled The Holocaust on Trial, is written by D.D. Guttenplan. It is a powerful, wide-ranging, chilling piece, in which the mere posing of Irving's thesis causes the reader to shudder with sickening wave-like swells.

"How do we know that there really were gas chambers at Auschwitz? Or that millions of Jews were killed?"

We have heard and seen the dangerous spectacle of these questions cynically dripping from the mouths of malevolent poseurs, like droplets of poison falling into a reservoir of fresh water.

Ultimately the accumulation can, and does, cause harm.

It is therefore our duty, indeed the duty of all society, to constantly stream truth into the well-springs of history from which our younger generations drink their knowledge and information about the world they will inherit and for which they will one day be responsible.

Even as examinations and cross-examinations were being conducted in the London courtroom, the official propaganda organ of the ruler of Syria in Damascus, described the Holocaust as a "myth" that Israel and the "Zionist organizations exploit for their financial and political gain."

In London, Damascus and, undoubtedly, other places too, there is no rest for the truth nor respect for its sanctity.

But there are, throughout the world, sanctuaries of honesty. Thus, while the London trial continues, the haunting, stunning art exhibit, Memories of Terezin, is on display in the modest art gallery of the Istituto Italiano Di Cultura at 496 Huron Street in Toronto. It is an artistic defiance to the distorters of the truth and of the historic record.

Giorgio Celiberti with some of his works.

The exhibition, which runs until April 7, features the work of Giorgio Celiberti, one of Italy's most famous contemporary artists.

It is a tour de force.

Understated contrasts of pale and dark forces, of beiges and greys, of sharp symbols and rough textures, with the replication of walls, of confinement, of doleful and desolate inner spaces, the exhibition pays homage to the thousands of children who were brought to the camp on their way to Auschwitz.

Celiberti's pieces are abstractions capturing the pitiful contradiction of children and despair. In some works, we see the recurring theme of child-like stylizations of the human heart gathered together as if in an attempt at communal comfort. The artist himself describes the device as suggestive of "the hearts of those Jewish children, telling me what is a heart, where it is, how much and how it beats, in a breast, on a wall, in a memory..."

The canvases and the other materials on which Celiberti has left his impressions evoked in me a hush of emotions, a silent testament, a tearful imagining of the children whose lives passed through the surrealist territory of the Nazi kingdom.

Carlo Coen, the director of the institute, and whose initiative brought the display to Toronto, spoke briefly but poignantly to the visitors at the opening of the exhibit.

"My father told me never to forget what happened in the war. He told me to tell my children so that they will be able to tell their children. Never, ever forget," Coen recounted for the assembled, in explaining why it was important to bring Memories of Terezin to Toronto.

"How significant and symbolic it is that the Celiberti showing should be the first exhibit of the new century at the institute," Francesco Scarlata, the consul general of Italy, pointed out.

I left the celebratory opening of the exhibit last week, after a viewing of some 45 minutes, in awe of the artist's power. As I walked towards my car, in the chill and damp of a cold January evening in Toronto, I was warmed somewhat that the works I had just seen were a forthright, artistic defiance of those people in London and Damascus who would distort or deny truth.

For information about the exhibit, phone 416-921-3802.

Attack on two seniors not hate motivated: police

Arrest expected soon

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Arrests were imminent late last week in a highly publicized attack on two Jewish seniors on their way to Friday evening services last summer.

The incident, which took place Aug. 13 outside Torath Emeth Jewish Centre on Viewmount Avenue, was "without a doubt" not hate-motivated, said Det. Joseph Stubbs of the Toronto police, 13 Division, lead investigator in the case.

The police Hate Crimes Unit was involved in the investigation, which eventually pointed to a motive of mistaken identity, said Stubbs.

The attack on Silvain Miller and Jacob Lazar, who were 66 and 79 respectively, was related to an attack Sept. 25 on their neighbour, 63-year-old Lawrence Skolnik, in the parking garage of their apartment building at 2500 Bathurst St., said Stubbs.

Skolnik was punched repeatedly in the head and his watch was stolen.

Marco Forte, 21, a Toronto-area university student, was arrested in November and charged with one count of robbery in the parking garage incident. He was held in custody briefly before being released on bail. A preliminary hearing will be held Feb. 25 at Metro North Court.

Last Friday, Stubbs told The CJN Forte would be surrendering himself and would be charged on Tuesday of this week for the August incident as well.

A "known associate" of Forte, also 21, had yet to be arrested at press time.

A third person "who did not participate in the assaults but who was responsible for causing" the incidents, was being sought.

The motivation appears to have been a "bad business transaction," said Stubbs.

Miller said his bruises have healed, but "inside it's a little..."

The attack on Miller and Lazar followed by three days Buford Furrow Jr.'s shooting spree at a Los Angeles Jewish Community Centre, which injured five people.

The timing caused concern that there was a rise in anti-Semitic acts in Toronto, Stubbs noted.

Any time an incident occurs, police need to be aware of it, he stressed.

The summer attack spurred reports of previous egg-tossing incidents, which led to the arrest of young offenders for simple assault.

Now that the attacks on Miller, Lazar and Skolnik are nearing resolution, "it's important that people understand this was strictly a crime of violence, as ugly as that is," said Bernie Farber, executive director, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

The police did "an admirable job investigating a complicated crime," he said.

"I don't think there's any indication to suggest an increase in violent crime against Jews as hate crimes per se."

Community forum reveals teen violence concern

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The anger and frustration felt by members of Toronto's Jewish community spilled out last week at a public forum on teen violence in the Jewish community.

During the question period, people in the audience slammed the Young Offenders Act and the coddling of young criminals, demanded that parents take responsibility for instilling values in their children, and complained about the media appearing to glorify violent behaviour and the pernicious effects of video games, television and movies.

The forum, held at the City Playhouse in Vaughan, was sponsored by the Flamingo, Markham, and Richmond Hill Chabad synagogues, the Jewish Russian community Centre, the Chabad Shtiebel and the Chabad Israeli Community.

While the program was part of the celebration of 50 years of leadership by the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the impetus was the murder of 15-year-old Matti Baranovski in a North York park last November.

Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen moderated a panel which consisted of Norman Blumenthal, a New York clinical psychologist specializing in adolescent psychology; Darcy Wallen, an independent consultant on teens at risk, also from New York; and Councillor Norman Gardner, chair of the Toronto Police Services Board.

Gardner, a strong advocate for changes to the Young Offender Act, said that while the government intended it to be a compassionate response to crime, the young see it as sanctioning their behaviour.

While crime statistics generally have declined, Gardner said, youth violent crimes have "more than doubled." As well, youngsters are coming to the attention of police at younger and younger ages.

In 1998, he said, nearly one quarter of all crimes were committed by those under 18. And the crimes were getting increasingly violent.

Disturbingly, the number of females involved in crime, including violent ones, has increased dramatically between 1991 and 1998, Gardner added.

Cartoons, television programs, and video games, and movies have spawned an increasing desensitization to violence, he said. "We take violence for granted. Even if the good guy wins, it doesn't matter how he wins."

Inflicting pain has become a source of entertainment, not revulsion, Gardner said. "Kids cheer at torture. They are learning to kill and like it."

Changes in family life, including divorced and single parent families, and children being brought up by nannies, can lead to gangs taking the place of family.

The murder rate would be higher, he said wryly, "if it were not for modern medical technology and the paramedics."

Wallen noted that the importance of parenting is reflected by a statistic on the root of bullying. She said 50 percent of bullies in schools have been bullied by others – particularly their parents.

Parents must be role models, she said, charging that they often depend on schools to fill the vacuum left by their own busy lives.

Children must learn that it is not imperative to win an argument, that avoiding confrontation is not weakness, that "real men" don't have to be aggressive and "real women" submissive, and that asking for help is a sign of strength, not of weakness.

She suggested family mealtimes and outings, and volunteering in their children's schools as ways parents can involve themselves in their children's lives.

Most of all, she said, "listen to your kids. Let go of your own opinions."

Children need and want limitations and guidance, she said. "They need to have a clear sense of right and wrong."

Blumenthal said that people used to think that teenage violence was something that "happened in the ghettos – it didn't happen to us." Now, he said, "it is epidemic [an] all over the world."

It is important to realize that attraction to cliques or gangs is part of a natural move in adolescence away from the home and family to the peer group, he noted.

The danger, he said, is when people turn the gang or clique into family, but a family where there is no controls, where a "mob psychology" can take over and which strengthens the teenage "sense of imperviousness."

He urged parents to not put down their children's friends. "Take an interest in them," he urged. "Spend a few minutes with them – introduce yourself as an adult into the group." This will prevent the youngsters "going underground" to an undesirable peer group.

Ronen noted that Canadian Jewish Congress and the Federations were establishing a task force on youth violence, which would include the Jewish Russian Community Centre, the Board of Jewish Education, Jewish Family & Child Service, Northview Collegiate (where Baranovski attended), and Police 32 Division.

A special guest at the event was Olga Baranovski and Eliot Korczak, the mother and stepfather of Matti Baranovski. Also present were Vaughan councillors Susan Kadis and Mario Racco and York Region councillor, Michael Di Biase.

After the forum, many members of the audience signed a petition urging reform of the Young Offenders Act.

Crown seeks to reopen Roma trial

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Ontario Crown attorney is seeking to reopen the evidentiary portion of a hate crime trial in the wake of a judge's ruling that there is insufficient evidence before him that Roma and Gypsy are interchangeable terms.

Maggie Lazaridis, last week, requested that Judge Russell Otter reopen the case to permit expert testimony to show that the two terms mean the same thing. Lazaridis was forced to make the application after defence lawyers requested the case against their clients be thrown out.

They argued that while the charges allege the promotion of hate against Roma, all the evidence referred to Gypsies. During the trial, the defence conceded that the Roma are an identifiable group persecuted by the Nazis during World War II. But they say, they did not concede the same for Gypsies.

Last week, Judge Otter refused to take judicial notice that the two terms are interchangeable, saying there is lack of uniformity about the terms in dictionary definitions. Some dictionaries consulted by the court defined Roma as Gypsy, especially a male, while others defined it simply as Gypsy.

Lazaridis told The CJN that throughout the trial, "we all understood the two terms were interchangeable."

The case arises out of a 1997 demonstration in front of the Lido Hotel where seven skinheads protested the presence of Roma refugee claimants. One protester carried a sign that said, "Honk if you hate Gypsies." Another carried a swastika flag.

Judge Otter said he would rule on March 24 whether he will reopen the case.

Mazon allocations reach new levels

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An anonymous donation of $290,000 from a single benefactor last year, helped Mazon Canada reach new levels of allocations to organizations fighting hunger.

The donation, which came in installments of $200,000, $70,000 and $20,000, raised Mazon's 1999 allocations level to $534,600, its highest annual total ever. As an indication of the organization's growth, it took Mazon Canada more than seven years to reach a cumulative total of $500,000.

In 1999, Mazon's grand total of allocations since its inception in 1987 reached $2,156,045.

"Although we are thrilled to be able to make such a meaningful contribution into the national fight against hunger, we are sad to say that the number of Canadians requiring our help has not declined despite the improvement in our economy," said Jacqueline Kott-Wolle, executive-director of Mazon Canada. "It seems that more and more families and individuals are in great need."

Mazon, which calls itself "a Jewish response to hunger," raises funds through a variety of means and distributes them to frontline organizations that address the issue of hunger in Canada. The allocations are made twice yearly and recipient organizations are chosen on a non-sectarian basis.

Food banks and social service agencies that distribute food or run meal programs, receive grants ranging from $500 to $6,000. In Montreal, for example, Tomchei Shabbos received $2,500 while the Thunder Bay Boys and Girls Club received $2,500.

In 1999, "we funded our traditional programs, including food banks, which use our funds for the purchase of items which are not normally donated to them through food drives. These items include fresh fruits and vegetables, milk, bread, meats and other healthy items," Kott-Wolle said.

As a result of the last year's record level of donation, Mazon was able to give grants to 98 percent of applicants and still have $70,000 left over for its 2000 campaign.

It's not clear at this point whether Mazon's benefactor will favour the organization with another generous donation. The individual "is very dedicated to the issue of hunger in Canada...He's known to the community," but does not wish to be identified, she said.

One of the first major events for 2000 on Mazon's Toronto calendar is scheduled for March 28, when the second annual Kosher Gourmet Gala will take place at Roy Thomson Hall. Last year, approximately 450 participants helped Mazon raise $40,000. "We've already hit $30,000 in ticket sales ($50 each) and donations this year," Kott-Wolle said.

Twenty-nine kosher caterers, wine distributors and dessert makers are slated to participate in the event, which resembles a large cocktail party.

The Toronto event still has some distance to go to match the success of the Montreal Food Fest, which in its sixth year, in 1999, raised almost $200,000.

Other Mazon fundraising tools include its all-occasion cards, Passover greeting cards and simchah place cards. Mazon's first fundraising concept – in which hosts of simchahs were asked to donate three percent of their food bill – remains popular, Kott-Wolle said.

In other developments, Mazon announced it will host a Web site in the near future. Its address will be www.mazoncanada.ca.

For more information or to book tickets to the Kosher Gourmet Gala, Mazon can be reached at 783-7554.

The gavel in Canada's hand

After a hiatus of nearly four years, the Mideast multilateral discussions co-sponsored by the United States and Russia resumed last week for a one-day meeting in Moscow. It was hoped that the much publicized gathering would provide a high profile boost to the slow, cautious efforts towards peace and regional normalization.

Indeed, the day-long meetings did occasion a small measure of progress, as four of the five working groups were able to announce dates for the resumption of their discussions.

The multilateral talks were launched in 1991 at the peace conference in Madrid. Five working groups were established to attempt to resolve the issues of: water, economic co-operation, the environment, regional arms control and refugees.

Canada is the gavel holder of the working group dealing with refugees. It is an enormously complicated and electrically charged subject that touches upon the sorest aspects of the history of the conflict between Jews and Arabs in the land of Israel. It therefore requires the gavel holder to demonstrate wisdom, impeccable judgment and motives that are beyond suspicion. The keynote address delivered last week in Moscow by Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy for the refugee working group, however, offers little evidence that the gavel holder has the requisite qualities to chair these sensitive discussions.

In putting forth his vision for success, Axworthy suggested: "It seems that a solution with a largely regional focus, respecting the rights of the refugees and offering them choices as to their future, is most likely to receive the support of the international community." (our emphasis)

Can it be only by oversight that the minister used language that is loaded code in the conflict, words fraught with meaning and consequence to the parties? Without any delimiting phrase qualifying the "choices" to be offered to the refugees – such as "reasonable," "appropriate," "suitable," or even simply "some," how are the parties to interpret the minister's statement other than as including as one of the available "choices" for the refugees' future, their right of return?

It is certain – and the Palestinian Authority knows it to be – that Israel cannot accede to the right of return for Palestinian refugees. To do so would begin the process of the dismantling of the country.

It is therefore an unrealistic "choice" to be held out to the refugees and a careless, if not irresponsible, suggestion for the gavel holder of the refugee working group to make to them.

Knowing this, by excluding any reference to "the support of the parties" in favour of "the support of the international community," the minister seems to suggest that the collective will of the international community ought to be as determinative of the ultimate outcome of the refugee "issue" as that of the specific wills of the parties, in particular, of course, that of Israel.

The gavel that Canada holds in its hand should be a symbol of impartiality and of an undoubted commitment to finding a just and reasonable solution having regard to all of the circumstances that have led the parties to the negotiating table. Let it be used thus.

Singles meet their bashert

In response to the letter from Charles Abshez, "Database of Orthodox Singles" (CJN, Jan. 13), the Intersynagogue Singles of Greater Toronto has been in existence since the spring of 1998 as a group of individuals represented by a number of Conservative and Reform synagogues and organizations. Programs with Jewish traditional values and venues are planned as a group and as individual congregations to serve the social and spiritual needs of our Jewish singles. The efforts of this group have been most successful, bringing dynamic speakers, musicals and stimulating Oneg Shabbats to large audiences of Jewish singles. Will referendum plague Israel?

The Israeli government has indicated during the peace talks with Syria that before a final phase is achieved, a referendum will be held to determine whether or not Israel should relinquish its control of the Golan Heights and return that land to Syria. Just as those of us in Canada agonize over the next referendum by the Quebec separatists, similar issues will be faced by the Israelis. What will be the form of the question? Will 50 percent plus one determine the final result? The ultimate irony is that the eventual return of the Golan Heights will be a favourable step forward in achieving peace in the Middle East while a vote for separation, while not necessarily resulting in war, will certainly create years of turmoil and uncertainty for the rest of Canada. In both Israel and Canada, it is imperative that logic and common sense prevail and that mutual trust be created by strong leaders.

Hotel is not in Palestine

We wish to register our concern that in its recent promotional brochure's listing of "New Hotel Openings," Holiday Inn Priority Club indicates that the Bethlehem Jacir Palace Inter-Continental Hotel is located in "Palestine."

Bass Hotels and Resorts should be aware that there exists no internationally recognized geographical designation as "Palestine" and that informal use of the term is misleading and inaccurate. Bethlehem is situated in the area currently under the control of the Palestinian Authority, but there is no independent state known as Palestine. As the Middle East peace process evolves, the direct parties to the dispute will resolve territorial matters on a bilateral basis. Until then, outside organizations and agencies such as Bass Hotels and Resorts should avoid using terminology that prejudges the outcome of these complex negotiations.

We respectfully request that future editions of Bass Hotels and Resorts materials list the location of the Bethlehem Jacir Palace Inter-Continental Hotel as "Palestinian Authority," and not "Palestine." We thank you for your consideration of the above.

Asks about Rabbi Ernest Klein

I am looking for information about Rabbi Ernest Klein. He was the rabbi of the Nove Zamky community, Slovak Republic, from 1929 to 1944.

He was born 1899 in Satmari, Siebengebirgen, Romania. He got his PhD at the University of Vienna in 1925. He was elected rabbi of Nove Zamky community in 1929. In 1944, he was deported to KZ Auschwitz and later to KZ Dachau, where he was liberated. After the liberation he served as rabbi in his birth place of Satmari. After his emigration to France he was a rabbi of the synagogue on Rue de Montevideo in Paris (1950-1951) and in 1952 he emigrated to Canada and was rabbi at Congregation of Beth Yischak (or Yitzchak?) in Toronto.

He spoke 30 languages, 16 fluently, published a comprehensive etymological dictionary and was awarded a high Canadian order.

I found out that he was awarded the Order of Canada (officer) in July, 1978, and that he passed away 2/4/1983.

The Jewish community in Nove Zamky would like to know more about his life in Toronto, and would like to get in touch with the Congregation of Beth Yitzchak, his friends and/or family.

I would appreciate any help you can give to the community of Nove Zamky, and if you have any problems communicating with them in English, I can translate the letters for you.

Arab terrorism still a threat

I am writing you about your editorial (CJN, Jan. 13), titled "Civilized Nations Must Respond." I heartily concur when you say that the statements expressed by Ayatollah Ali Khameini and the speaker of Iran's parliament, namely that Jerusalem must be liberated and Israel wiped off the map of the world, must be addressed. As you very well put it, these sinister propositions must not be left unchallenged.

I believe it is also important to remember that the Arab terrorist organization covenant calling for the destruction of Israel, despite disclaimers from President Clinton on down, has neither been abrogated or amended.

The lie that produced Haider

By ELIAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Austria, a country that has never fully confronted its Nazi past seems destined to do so now as it conducts a pitiful romance with Joerg Haider and his Freedom Party.

The Austrians are not totally to blame for this situation. The republic that came into being after World War II was a product of sin – the sin of a historical lie.

Because of the rivalry between the world's powers after the war, the allies accepted the fiction that Austria had never been an integral part of the Third Reich but was rather an occupied country. The acceptance of this lie liberated Austria from the moral – and, to a large extent, legal – obligation to completely overhaul both its values and its political system.

The main problem is not Haider, who is being spoken of as Austria's future chancellor. Nor is it Haider's party, which emerged in the recent general elections as the country's second largest party. The real problem is the political hygiene of the Austrian nation, whose voters elected Kurt Waldheim as their president even after details emerged concerning his military past in World War II.

This is the same Austrian nation that is now showing increased support for Haider, while the world increasingly condemns his views.

Austria was never occupied by Hitler. The truth is that Austria voluntarily joined Nazi Germany, with the enthusiastic support of the majority of Austrian citizens. Austria was Adolf Hitler's homeland as well as the birthplace of Adolf Eichmann and many of the most detested war criminals of the World War II.

Haider is opposed to Austrian membership in the European Union; ironically, though, his inclusion in the next Austrian government will provide a tremendous impetus to extreme right-wing parties in Europe.

One of the key factors behind the rise of Nazism in Germany nearly 70 years ago was the great depression.

In contrast, Austria today enjoys robust economic health. Its unemployment rate is half the EU's average, while its annual inflation rate is only 1 percent and its social service system is considered one of the best in Europe.

It was neither hunger nor joblessness that led 27 percent of Austria's voters to cast their ballot for the Freedom Party. Apparently, the main reason was simply the fact that many Austrians are fed up with 30 years of Social Democratic rule – about half of which was spent in coalitions with the People's Party.

Haider has achieved such an eminent position in Austrian politics not only because of a desire for change within the Austrian nation, but also because of his encouragement of xenophobia.

A public opinion survey published last October indicated that half of all Austrians dislike foreigners: 59 percent of them believe that foreigners are responsible for a rise in the crime rate, 47 percent consider them a heavy burden on the country's social services, and 42 percent feel that foreigners are pushing Austrians out of the workplace.

The exploitation of these sentiments is one of the two major components forming the basis of Haider's extreme right-wing populism.

The second factor in Haider's rise to prominence is a nostalgia among Austrians for their "past" – Austria's more distant past, that is. Essentially, this nostalgia is a longing for the pan-Germanism of the 1920s, which helped pave the road for the Anschluss, Nazi Germany's incorporation of Austria.

It is quite possible that xenophobia in Europe nowadays does not necessarily mean anti-Semitism. Nonetheless, Haider has not left much doubt in people's minds as to where his sympathies lie.

Appearing before a conference of former SS members, he addressed his audience as "My dear friends" and even praised them for showing such deep loyalty to their principles.

On another occasion, he described SS members as "decent people of good character" and, 10 years ago, again at an SS gathering, he lauded "your self-sacrifice, which saved Europe," and went on to say that "today we need people like you who know the true meaning of the word 'homeland.'"

An Austrian war criminal who murdered civilians in Italy has been described by Haider as "a dedicated, loyal soldier."

Haider and members of his party realize that in post-Holocaust Europe, public figures openly espousing anti-Semitism doom themselves to the sidelines of political life.

Instead, Haider is currently settling for a more "moderate" policy of questioning whether there ever was a Holocaust.

It should be pointed out that – to anyone's recollection – Haider has not made even one anti-Semitic pronouncement in public. The Viennese newspaper, Profil, has even predicted that a government including the Freedom Party would actually accelerate the process of returning looted property to its Jewish owners, and would increase support for synagogues and Jewish schools.

According to Profil, this projection proves that Haider is not anti-Semitic. Haider's spokesperson recently declared that "the percentage of anti-Semites in our party is no greater than in any other Austrian political party."

If true however, that certainly does not say very much for Austria.

Far-right party agrees to join Austrian government

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The strong condemnation of Freedom Party leader Joerg Haider by the Europeans and the world community brought back memories of a Jewish-led campaign to isolate Austria in the 1980s.

Then, Kurt Waldheim was elected president despite revelations that he concealed a Nazi past.

The Haider controversy today bears similarities to the Waldheim affair, but in many ways it is strikingly different.

For one thing, much of Waldheim's support grew from a resentful backlash against world Jewish organizations – a reaction that was heavily, and openly, tinged with anti-Semitism.

This time, Jewish leaders have voiced sharp criticism of Haider, but have mainly stayed out of the spotlight.

Instead, Austria's 14 European Union partners, vowing to rebuff any anti-democratic trends within Europe, took on the battle to keep the Freedom Party, and particularly Haider, out of the halls of power.

Although Haider has appeared to have negotiated a position for his party in the next Austrian government, the EU's actions did give real weight to the pressure.

The restrictions which were applied to Austria during the Waldheim affair – including barring Waldheim from entering the United States – hurt, but they were more humiliating than meaningful.

Austria at the time was a neutral country seen as a buffer between NATO and the Soviet bloc.

But Austria joined the European Union in 1995, and EU sanctions would have a real material effect on the country.

"What we have is a new situation," said Edward Serotta, who directs the Vienna-based Central European Center for Research and Documentation. "The EU has never done anything like this before."

Serotta, like other observers, predicted that there will be some backlash and resentment against the EU threat, but said the changed international situation will play a role in what comes next.

The controversy over Waldheim led to two trends in Austria.

On one hand, it was the catalyst for a new openness in facing Austria's role in the Holocaust and led to numerous government initiatives supporting Jewish causes and accepting responsibility for wartime persecution of Jews.

"Whatever the combination of forces that impel it, there is now, for the first time in postwar Austria, a serious commitment to fighting racism and anti-Semitism," wrote Jewish scholar, Robert Wistrich, in a report last year on Austria and the legacy of the Holocaust.

On the other hand, he continued, "if the establishment has become more liberal in the wake of the Waldheim fiasco, the reservoir of provincial conservatism and of radical-populist protest remains formidable."

This negative trend coalesced around the Freedom Party and particularly around Haider himself. He was elected leader of the party in 1986 when he was only 37 and radicalized it into a hotbed of national populism that appeals to "Austria for the Austrians."

Opinions

Jerusalem and Berlin

In the early 1950s, Israel's prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, and Konrad Adenauer, the new Germany's first chancellor, established relations on behalf of their two nations.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

At the time I was very dubious about it, I must admit. I had lived for 2½ years under Adolf Hitler and my infantry division had liberated the first concentration camp during the war. I saw with my own eyes what ultimate evil could do to human beings.

I am glad to say that Ben-Gurion had more foresight than I, for he believed that indeed Germany could and would reform itself, and that a relationship between the two countries represented a special opportunity for both. History has shown that the relationship has lasted for almost half a century already.

I have visited the new Germany from time to time on personal trips, as well as official study missions, to assess the state of the new nation – from the way it handled the memory of the Shoah to its new literature and theatre.

Recently, another notable event took place. The former German chancellor, Helmut Kohl, was in Jerusalem to lay the cornerstone for the Konrad Adenauer Memorial.

"For everyone who has a sense of history," said Kohl, "this is a great moment.

"After the Second World War no one believed that Israel and Germany would enter into close amicable relations, and the Konrad Adenaeur Memorial in Jerusalem is an important contribution to the tradition of our two nations working together for peace and security. Fifty-four years after the Holocaust, we who were apparently forever separated have indeed come together."

Jerusalem's mayor, Ehud Olmert, responded to the sentiments of Kohl in like manner: He called the former chancellor "a symbol of the responsibility of Germany vis-a-vis Israel and the Jewish people."

On Nov. 2, Kohl was invited to the Knesset to receive the Teddy Kollek Prize. Chairman Abraham Burg presented the award to him for his contribution to the betterment of the quality of human life and the development of Jerusalem.

That the centre is to be named after the first German chancellor was an idea of Teddy Kollek, former long-time mayor of Jerusalem.

The centre will be used for political, cultural and scientific conferences and has been built not only with public money, but also with the help of private enterprise. Businesses like the publisher of Spiegel magazine, automaker Daimler/Chrysler and Siemens Corporation are participating in financing the newest addition to the capital.

I know that there are still those who cannot and will not believe that Germany has ever truly repented and changed fundamentally. This is what I thought some years ago, but since then, I have become reassured that Israel's faith to the contrary has indeed been justified.

Teach the lessons locally, too

The two defining moments of 20th-century Jewish history are the Holocaust and the founding of the State of Israel. As North American Jews, we have among us those who survived the former, and those who helped to create and sustain the latter.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

It is the former to whom I wish to speak. You, who survived the Nazi slaughter and came to Canada after the war, are doubly heroic.

First, you survived, an accomplishment that few of us can really appreciate, living as we do in a free country where Jews have come to occupy a respected place.

Second, survivors have become a living legacy to the youth of Canada. By telling your stories, sharing your lives in a way few of us would be willing to do, you have made the unthinkable a little more understandable to the people who hear you speak. By attempting to convey your pain and loss, you point the way to better understanding among the peoples who make up our country.

We know that every year survivors' numbers grow less. Yet you will leave those stories you have told, which have been captured on film and video; accounts written for families or published as books; and, perhaps most precious of all, the few artifacts you managed to save from the fire: a yellow star, ghetto money, a child's ring or shoe, a passport or identity card stamped with the dreadful twisted cross, photographs of dead families, a watch chain, letters from the ghettos, tffilin from a bar mitzvah held in the ghetto, sforim (books), a certificate of ordination or a certificate from a charity such as Keren Kayemet, the charity box your mother kept on the shelf. The list could go on and on.

Unfortunately, these few things snatched from the burning are now a commodity for many museums which, in good faith, are seeking to build a "collection" of Holocaust memorabilia.

One cannot quarrel with the significance of Yad VaShem, the Holocaust Museum in Washington D.C., or the Museum of Jewish Life in New York.

Millions of visitors, many with little or no first-hand knowledge of the Jewish experience, will visit these places and learn for the first time about the joys and sorrows of Jewish life.

Obviously, the first place these remnants of a lost life belong is with your families. But I believe the next place is in your own communities, where your children and grandchildren live, and where your lives have had an immediate and unique impact.

Most Jewish communities in Canada of size now have Holocaust remembrance and education programs which reach thousands of non-Jewish public school students every year.

Since 1974, Vancouver has sponsored Holocaust education symposiums which bring thousands of students together to hear first-hand accounts from survivors. These symposiums travel throughout the province to communities which have never seen a Jew.

The Holocaust Education and Remembrance Centre sponsors exhibits that help students and teachers understand not only how evil triumphed for a time, but how good people can make a difference.

The survivors, the core of this and any program on education and remembrance, have been generous in donating things which enhance that story. Vancouver's Centre now has hundreds of items which reflect the many experiences.

Yet survivors are being coaxed to donate this material evidence to museums far away from where they live. This loss, I believe, impoverishes our own community and its ability to teach the lessons of the Holocaust.

While the large museums of Jewish life are certainly important links in a chain of remembrance, they are not the whole story.

You had productive and important lives before Hitler destroyed your worlds; you have had productive and important lives here in Canada, in the communities where you settled, in the synagogues and schools where you worship and teach, and where your children and grandchildren live.

It would be a great loss to Canadian Jewish life if these things were disengaged from their local communities and exhibited far away from where their owners made new lives.

I do not for a moment want to denigrate the impact Yad VaShem has, or the fine presentation in New York, or the first claim that your families have on your memories.

However, before sending these precious things away from your own community, consider first the community in which you live, and the legacy you can leave for generations of its young people who may never hear a survivor speak or see that yellow star, that child's ring, or that tattered photograph of a lost world.

Producing vibrant communities

There it was – an item buried on page 23 of the Jan. 27th issue of The CJN. It was not really an item; rather, it was a picture and a caption in the On Campus section of the paper. You could be forgiven if you missed it.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

The caption is titled Tackling Teacher Shortage, and goes on to note that York University's Jewish Teacher Education Program, in partnership with some entity called the Western Canadian Coalition of Jewish Education, has secured a grant in the sum of $185,000 from the Covenant Foundation in New York, to address the shortage of teachers at Jewish day schools.

Put this way, it is a fairly innocuous – and unimportant – community notice, indicating that York University will get a little money to study the shortage of teachers in Jewish schools.

The picture is fairly typical of community items as well. It shows four people standing in an office posing for the camera. Three of those in the picture represent York University. They are all smiling, as you would expect. The person who is smiling the most, however, is the other person – the short fellow second from the left. The caption indicates that he is Joshua Ben-Simon, the coalition co-ordinator.

Ben-Simon has good reason to smile, because he and his colleagues in the Western Canadian Coalition of Jewish Educators (its proper name), have a dream, and the grant from the Covenant Foundation is the first step along the road to the realization of this dream.

I should disclose from the outset, that Josh is an educator in the junior high program of the Edmonton Talmud Torah and is one of my son Joel's teachers. He is also a member of my shul and a participant in the ever expanding chavurah that learns together on Shabbat following Minchah. But this column is not about Josh or his colleagues in the coalition. It is about their vision.

The Western Canadian Coalition of Jewish Educators was founded in 1997 with the aim of working co-operatively to meet program objectives and personnel needs. It is supported by the professional staff and boards of day schools in Winnipeg, Edmonton, and Vancouver.

The coalition quickly ascertained that one of the most crucial challenges facing western Canadian day schools was the shortage of teachers. A program was developed with the assistance of York's Jewish Teacher Program, and the idea was "sold" to the Covenant Foundation, who agreed to provide initial funding – the first time the foundation has embraced a Canadian proposal.

Under the terms of the proposal, five students will be recruited every two years from the Jewish communities of Manitoba, Alberta, and British Columbia to enter York's Jewish Education Program. In addition to their studies in the university, they will acquire field study and practice teaching experience in schools in Toronto as well as Jewish day schools in Western Canada. Thanks to the good offices of Israeli Ambassador David Sultan, one year of the program will be spent in Israel, with Israeli institutes of higher learning assisting in the design and implementation of this part of the program.

Local communities in Western Canada will provide scholarship support of up to 50 percent of tuition and living expenses for the students. Students will graduate with a bachelor of education and will be certified to teach in public schools and Jewish day schools. In return, the students will commit to working for three years in day schools in Western Canada. As a former Maritimer, I know that if they come, they will stay.

The goal is to recruit and prepare highly qualified and extremely motivated teachers for our Jewish day schools. but the vision is something much grander – the vision is to promote and enhance Jewish life; indeed, the vision is nothing less than to ensure the viability and vibrancy of the Jewish communities in Western Canada. This is why the item deserves to be front page news.

Some time ago, I wrote a column about Jewish continuity. In it, I noted that many Jewish students from Alberta chose (or were forced by their parents) to go to university in Toronto. I said that Toronto had a special obligation to these students to provide them with a meaningful Jewish life on the campuses. I also said that we, in Edmonton, had a special obligation to the students who remained here at the University of Alberta to provide them with a rich and expressive Jewish life. I am happy to report that the newly formed Jewish Chaplaincy Association and the Hillel Jewish Students Association, under the leadership of president Lisa Joseph and vice-president Michelle Isaacson, are working hard to provide a meaningful Jewish life for students at the U of A.

And they are succeeding. The students are doing just fine, as I found out at their recent Shabbat dinner. Almost 90 students attended (one per every 2.5 members)!

Bricks and mortar by themselves, do not produce a meaningful and enriching Jewish life. It takes vision, commitment, dedication and hard work. It is through these qualities that we will produce viable and vibrant Jewish communities in Western Canada.

The Kirshner File

Poland and the Jews before World War II

The majority of Polish Jews were thrown into mourning with the death of Jozef Pilsudski – the prime minister of Poland – in 1935.

A revered though authoritarian figure, Pilsudski was hardly a philo-Semite. But he possessed certain virtues which Polish Jewry had learned to appreciate. He did not exclude minorities, including Jews, from his vision of the Polish state, and he resisted pressure to issue formal and explicit anti-Jewish decrees.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

And while it is true that anti-Semitism increased within his Sanacja camp in 1933 and 1934, widespread outbreaks of anti-Jewish violence did not occur during his premiership.

With his untimely departure from the scene, the Jews, who constituted almost 10 percent of Poland's population, experienced a significant deterioration in their political status. Pilsudski's successor, Marshall Edward Rydz-Smigly, was not as fairly benevolently disposed to Jews as he had been.

As Emanuel Melzer writes in No Way Out The Politics of Polish Jewry 1935-1939 (Hebrew Union College Press), Rydz-Smigly and his team perceived the so-called Jewish question as one of Poland's central problems. Its solution, they believed, would enable Poland to grapple with its economic and social ills.

These developments unfolded against the backdrop of Poland's evolving relationship with its powerful neighbor, Germany. In November 1933, Adolf Hitler offered Poland a 10-year non-aggression pact. The agreement was signed and sealed just two months later.

It had an immediate impact. The Polish government cracked down on Jewish newspapers and organizations which had been calling for a boycott of German goods. Furthermore, Poland renounced its obligation under the 1919 Treaty of Versailles to protect the rights of national minorities. Poland maintained that such obligations should be placed upon all states with ethnic minorities.

The upshot of these events was catastrophic for Jews. The far-right, anti-Semitic Endecja camp moved from a policy of verbal antipathy to one of outright violence to Jews, says Melzer, a Tel Aviv University scholar whose book is thorough and nuanced. This shift, in turn, prompted the governing Sanacja bloc to change its attitude toward Jews from one of tolerance to barely concealed enmity.

In one of its first punitive actions directed at the Jewish community, the government announced its intention to Polonize the economy. Catholic merchants and artisans from western Poland were encouraged to migrate into eastern areas where the Jewish population was much greater. In a related development, the regime not only promoted the formation of Catholic producers' and consumers' co-operatives, but granted them favorable credit terms. Local municipalities, meanwhile, forced Jewish merchants to vacate their stalls in markets.

The Catholic church also poisoned the waters. In February 1936, the primate of Poland, Cardinal August Hlond, published a pastoral letter accusing Jews of spreading atheism and revolutionary Bolshevism, and contributing to the decline of Polish morals through the publication of pornographic literature. Hlond, while condemning violence against Jews, urged Catholics to limit their contacts with Jews in the economic realm as much as possible.

There was, to be sure, opposition to the rising tide of anti-Semitism, particularly from left-wing and liberal circles. In Lodz, for example, a group composed of students, workers and priests published a weekly newsletter, Wolny Czlowiek, which countered anti-Semitic propaganda.

But in 1937, there was another turn for the worse. OZON, a new political bloc, was established under the leadership of Adam Koc, a conservative Sanacja loyalist. In Melzer's view, Koc's platform departed from the principle of the equality of all citizens of the state. By inferring that Jews were a foreign element in the body politic, and represented a danger to Poland's cultural and economic well-being, Koc broke with Sanacja tradition.

Melzer suspects that Koc's policy was a function of his desire to steal some of Endecja's thunder, and to guarantee that the reins of power would remain in Sanacja hands. Anti-Semitism was indeed a useful tool. Endecja used it to undermine support for Sanacja, while Polish conservatives saw it as a way to divert attention from Poland's internal problems.

Whether intentionally or not, Koc stoked the fires of anti-Semitism. In the second half of 1937, the Polish Merchants Union and the Organization of Small Businessmen, among other groups, intensified their campaign to remove Jews from Polish economic life so that they would be forced to emigrate.

According to Melzer, Jewish leaders did not respond effectively to the upsurge of anti-Semitism, whose violent manifestations took the form of pogroms and random attacks on individuals. Fragmented along ideological and religious lines, the Jewish community was deeply divided, with Zionists, socialists, communists, folkists and, of course, the fervently Orthodox.

Jewish political parties did not devote any great energy to parrying the concentrated attack against Jews in the economic field. Nor was the potential force of western Jewry exploited, he notes.

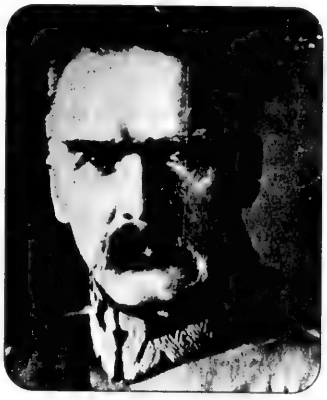
Throughout this calamitous period, the universities were a hotbed of anti-Semitic agitation and a stronghold of Endecja sentiment.

There were not only insistent demands to limit the number of Jewish students and professors (most of whom had obtained their positions before Polish statehood in 1918), but to remove Jews from student societies.

Worst of all, there were anti-Semitic spasms of violence and a demand for separate seating of Jewish students. The call for "ghetto benches," influenced by the passage of the 1936 Nurnberg laws in Germany, was especially pronounced in Warsaw, Lwow, Wilno and Krakow.

The Polish authorities condemned these manifestations of brutality and segregation, but took no concrete steps to outlaw them. The Bund – the Jewish socialists – was most active among Jewish organizations in the struggle against anti-Semitic activities on the campus. But the battle was lost when the government cravenly dropped its objection to ghetto benches.

Anti-Semitic forces, too, seized upon shchitah, demanding a ban on the kosher slaughtering of cattle. The issue was first raised in the Sejm (parliament) in 1923, but gained real legitimacy in the mid-1930s. On Jan. 1, 1937, the government passed legislation regulating the supply of cattle to kosher abattoirs and banning the practice in jurisdictions where Jews comprised less than three percent of the population.



Jozef Pilsudski

Emboldened by the anti-Semitic climate permeating Poland, a plethora of professional associations, ranging from the Polish Medical Association to the Polish Bar Association, restricted Jewish membership.

And in 1939, when Germany ordered Polish citizens without valid Polish passports to leave or face deportation, Poland failed to defend the rights of its nationals in Germany.

For obvious ulterior reasons, Poland supported the resettlement of masses of Polish Jews in Palestine. Pressing its agenda vigorously, Poland worked closely with the Jewish Agency, providing military training for Jews planning aliyah, and urging Britain to increase Palestine's Jewish immigration quota.

Clearly, Poland wanted its Jewish citizens to emigrate, the sooner the better.

The Price and Privilege of Growing Old*, by W. Gunther Plaut (CCAR Press).

In his 86th year, Rabbi Gunther Plaut is still going strong. He still lectures, writes, studies, performs sundry rabbinical duties as senior scholar at Holy Blossom Temple and participates in community activities. He is quick to admit, however, that he suffers from lapses of memory and that his vaunted prowess at tennis and golf has faltered in recent years.

Anyone who has lived so fully and successfully as Rabbi Plaut, and continues to do so, should be listened to for wisdom and knowledge accumulated over the years.

This is an honest book that looks at life and death without illusion or subterfuge. When the author noticed, for example, that his face had taken on a leaner and more aged look, he was initially distressed. "Since I could do nothing about my image, my subconscious gave me the kind of advice that, I found out later, others have followed also: 'Don't admire yourself in the mirror.' Henceforth I stopped all attempts of self-admiration and looked only for what I needed to see, as for instance whether my hair (what was left of it) could pass a cursory inspection.

"For a while, I shaved in semi-darkness to lessen my displeasure at seeing myself, and when I looked, I focused on the spot where the razor was supposed to go, not on my face as a whole. But in time I got used to reality, more or less anyway."

Rabbi Plaut opposes the idea of keeping unhappy news about the death of a loved one from the elderly. He writes that he has never learned of a single case where imparting such news has killed anyone. He is sure that "older people's psychic structure is not as frail as others may think." Older people are aware of the reality of death and are not so easily shocked or shaken. "Long life has toughened them and has provided an emotional armour."

How does he spend his leisure hours, knowing that the time remaining is limited and precious? He discovers, interestingly, that reading isn't always a friendly option for the elderly. Why? Because it requires concentration, which means an expenditure of energy – not always available for older persons. He regrets that as a writer his reading is specialized and that he rarely opens a book for pleasure or relaxation. But he chides those elderly persons who offer excuses for not reading because of lack of time.

Like many before him, the author is resentful of those who want to relegate the elderly to the ash heap of society. He is eager to rescue the term "old" from its present disparaging connotation and raise it to the level where the elderly are given a heightened sense of self-respect.

It is possible to remain creative and useful at every stage of life? Certainly. Rabbi Plaut admires the famous cellist Pablo Casals, who at the age of 93, wrote, "Age is a relative matter. If you continue to work and absorb the beauty in the world about you, you find that age does not necessarily mean getting old. At least not in the ordinary sense. I feel many things more intensely than ever before, and for me life grows more fascinating."

Is religion an aid against loneliness and despair? It is no surprise that the author answers this question in the affirmative. "Having spent the major part of my life in a religion-based environment, I have consistently found that people with a strong belief in a meaningful universe – which, after all, is the foundation of religion – have a sense that each person's life is important and that a loving God provides each one of us with the kind of life support that helps us to be at peace with the world."

This conviction plus a pattern of regular religious observance adds structure to one's life – especially when the regimen of regular work or structured activity is no longer possible.

Finally, Rabbi Plaut remains hopeful about the existence of a soul and the reality of the afterlife. He wonders, will he be able to meet with loved ones and friends? Of course, he doesn't know, but he finds immortality a good possibility, even if he does not consciously strive to earn it.

This, the author's 24th book is enhanced by the lively humorous illustrations of Roy Doty, an award-winning cartoonist and artist.

Snow and Israel

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The recent snowfall in Israel provided a welcome diversion from the country's usual onslaught of political news (the peace talks, the Weizman affair, the election fund-raising scandal, etc., etc., etc.)

When the heaviest snowfall in half a century blanketed the country, so did photographers who managed to capture Israel as a pristine winter wonderland. Many of these amazing pictures are now available online. You can print them or even download and make them your computer's desktop picture.

My favourites are from the Associated Press [http://news.excite.com/photo/ap/000128/04/int-israel-snow/1]. There are over twenty wonderful shots of Jerusalem in white, including kids in Mea Shearim building an igloo, two men (unsuccessfully) pushing a car up a snow-covered road near the Tower of David and a shot of Palestinian children tossing snowballs outside the Dome of the Rock.

The Jerusalem Post also sent out its photographer to cover the city. You can take a look at several popular neighbourhoods in snow and then there's Meir who decided that cross-country skiing is faster than walking in downtown Jerusalem [http://info.jpost.com/2000/Supplements/Snow/]. And the photographer from Reuters took north to the slopes to capture an Israeli snowboarder airborne at Mount Hermon [http://www.reuters.co.il/pix/html/FullRes/MDF21203.JPG].

Snow isn't an annual occurrence in Israel but when it does come, just a few inches can shut down the country, as was the case in 1992 [http://www.negev180.k12.il/kkl/eisr50/fifth/k50-45.htm] and then in 1998 [http://www.cnn.com/WEATHER/9801/12/israel.snow/]. There is a delightful two and a half minute CNN TV report available at this site.

You will need the free Vxtreme plug-in which I found quite finicky but did get to work [http://download.cnn.com/vxtreme/].

In a normal winter, the Golan's Mt. Hermon is the only place you might find snow [http://www.skiin.com/static/resorts/resort.pl/newe-at-main.en.html]. Israel's only snow ski slope was opened in 1969.

There's a ski lift now, but originally mules were used to get up the slopes. Moshav Neve Ativ operates the ski run which at its closest is about 200 metres from the Syrian border. You can watch a 15 second video showing passengers on the ski lift and today's skiing conditions at Isracamera [http://www.isracamera.co.il/rachbalbut.htm].

Another happy visitor to the snows of the Golan is "Reli" [http://www.acay.com.au/~dissi/pictures/pictisr.htm]. Reli is a two-year-old Saint Bernard who only gets to run through Israel's snow one day a year. She looks quite at home in the picture... but there's no word, though, on what's inside the oak keg around Reli's neck.

Although this year's was a particularly large storm, snow, of course, is nothing new to the Holy Land. Thousands of years ago the prophets were also moved by its beauty.

It was King David who said to God in Psalm 51:9, "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean: wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow" [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/bible/mthil051.html]. And who knows what an ancient Jerusalem looked like when David was inspired to write these words of praise: "He sends the snow like white wool; He scatters frost upon the ground like ashes" (Psalms 147:16) [http://www.jewishamerica.com/sabbath.htm].

Shul's ultimate mission

By RABBI ELIE KARFUNKEL

In this week's Torah reading, parshat Terumah, a verse states "They shall make a sanctuary for me so that I may dwell among them."

In this statement, Hashem declares that the Tabernacle, the Mishkan, which was built in the desert, will be His dwelling place, unconditionally.

Later on in the Tanach, in Kings 1, chapter 6, there is discussion about the building of the holy Temple, the Beit Hamikdash. Hashem says to King Solomon "This temple that you build, if you follow my decrees, perform my statutes, and observe all my commandments... I shall dwell among the children of Israel."

In regard to the Beit Hamikdash, Hashem will only dwell amongst the Jewish people if they live up to a specific ideal.

Here we see a stark contrast in terms. There are no conditions set for Hashem to dwell in the Mishkan, whereby residing in the Beit Hamikdash is dependent on the actions of the Jewish nation.

In order to resolve this difficulty, we must compare the structures of the Mishkan and the Beit Hamikdash. The Tabernacle was a mobile synagogue in the desert, made of cloth and boards. It was constantly being set up and taken down, and transported along with the Jews throughout their travels.

When building the Mishkan, the temporary nature of its structure did not allow for a sense of completion and fulfilment among those who contributed to its construction. They knew that erecting the Mishkan was just the beginning of their involvement, and that they would be expected to immerse themselves in its work and holiness even after it was built.

Therefore, Hashem did not need to make conditions to keep the Jewish nation in line. The mission of the Tabernacle was quite clear to them.

The Temple building on the other hand was by no means meant to be temporary. A magnificent building of stone, it was made to last for centuries. Therefore, it is very natural that its builders may have felt a sense of accomplishment after it was built, rejoicing over a job completed, and forgetting that the physical structure was just the beginning of their required involvement.

This was a very different situation than that in the desert. The people had to be reminded that their task was not over, and that the presence of Hashem in the Temple was contingent upon their continuous commitment to Torah and mitzvot.

Today, replacing the Mishkan and Beit Hamikdash are our shuls. We are quite blessed to have many beautiful synagogues across the country, boasting magnificent architecture and luxurious interiors.

However, the ultimate mission of a shul goes beyond its construction. Aside from its structure and aesthetic beauty, it must be made into a holy place, used for prayer, mitzvot, and sanctification of the name of God. Only then can we be guaranteed that Hashem will "dwell amongst the children of Israel."

THE FACES OF THE RESCUED: The people in these photos are from the remnants of the Qu'ara Jews in Ethiopia who recently arrived in Israel. The assistance of the communities of Jewish federations around the world helped make possible their return to Israel. The photos show the newcomers in Qu'ara (lower photo) and after their arrival in Israel.

Orthodox rabbi creating animated series for Israeli TV

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Don't tell author, speaker, former pulpit rabbi and historian, Rabbi Berel Wein, that he "retired" to Jerusalem.

Teaching at Ohr Somayach and Beit Knesset Hanasi, writing a column for the Jerusalem Post, and continuing a busy schedule of speaking, and historical research and writing, is not exactly withdrawing from the world.

Now he has a new project, producing a series of animated films about great Jewish personalities, as a way to instil Jewish pride and Jewish identity.

The series, called Heralds of Destiny, will be shown on Israeli television.

Rabbi Wein is not among those who see modern technology as intrinsically evil. "Technology is neutral," he said. "It can be used to build an atom bomb, or to cure illness."

"Film," he told a gathering at the home of Toronto dentist, Steven Ingber, "is one of the great weapons of today. And the Orthodox world hasn't exploited it."

Rabbi Berel Wein

Rashi, Rabbi Solomon ben Isaac, lived in Troyes, France, from 1040-1105. His commentaries on the Torah and Talmud are considered to be one of the bases of Jewish study.

The choice, Rabbi Wein confided to The CJN, was from a "personal bias. Rashi is a hero to me. He was a wonderful teacher and role model."

More than that, the rabbi said, he admires his "compassion, his world view, his relationship to the non-Jewish world."

While the 54-minute film is animated, it is not a cartoon. Rather, it is a series of 15,000 hand-drawn watercolours, animated by studios in Israel and Bulgaria, by Russian, Israeli and Bulgarian animators.

The voices in the film include well-known actors Leonard Nimoy as Rashi, and Armand Assante. Paul Scofield is the narrator.

Rashi; a Light After the Dark Ages, directed by Ashley Lazarus, is the pilot for a six-part series on the Jews and history. Other personalities being featured are Maimonides, Abarbanel, the Baal Shem Tov, and Dona Gracia Mendes.

Before the meeting, Rabbi Wein talked to The CJN about his pride in the State of Israel, a pride he says is not political, but rather an emotional and religious state of mind.

"It is a privilege to pay taxes to a Jewish state in Jerusalem."

While he acknowledges that Israel is "not perfect," he says that "It is doing pretty good for only 52 years. There is more Torah being studied than anyplace since the days of the Babylonian Talmud. You can live a full Jewish life there. You can light Chanukah candles outside; you can build a sukkah in the park."

As well, he said, he is awed by the ingathering of the exiles.

"It is as if Canada took in 50 million people from 85 countries. Could Canada do that? Well, Israel did."

The agenda of American Jews, particularly the question of religious pluralism, is not a matter of interest to the Israeli public, according to Rabbi Wein. The difficulties arise, he said, from the definition of just what the state is supposed to be.

"Is it a light to the other nations? The beginning of the messianic era? A haven for Jews? A political entity? Because we can't define it, everyone is disappointed."

Rashi is a production of The Destiny Foundation, which also produces audiotapes, books, and educational tools, and arranges Jewish educational history tours, lecture series and encounter weekends.

The video is available in Jewish bookstores, directly from the Destiny office, 1-800-499-WEIN, or through the Web site, www.weindestiny.com.

Intersynagogue singles offers community, social outlet

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What do a night of jazz music, a talk on financial matters and an Oneg Shabbat dinner have in common? The three events are among the programs being offered this month by the Intersynagogue Singles, a joint venture launched last May.

The group's committee members, who meet monthly at Adath Israel Congregation, ensure that programs run by participating synagogues are varied and do not conflict with one another, said Linda Friedman, chair of the program committee for singles at Shaar Shalom Synagogue.

Most programs are geared for ages 35 and up, although some synagogues offer programs for younger singles as well. Programs are planned jointly or by individual synagogues, and events are already scheduled throughout 2000.

"People can pick and choose what interests them," Friedman said.

She praised office staff and clergy of participating synagogues for their practical support – taking reservations and printing flyers and, in the case of many of the clergy, teaching or leading Oneg Shabbat services.

For Friedman, the group offers a sense of community and a social outlet, she said.

She attended a recent Friday night dinner when her children were with their father. "Being single doesn't mean you don't want a Jewish experience," she said.

The group is "not really a dating service," Friedman noted. "If you meet somebody [like two couples who did meet through the program], it's a bonus."

Many participants are divorced and may have experienced a change in their social circles, said Jack Lambert, chair of Beth Tikvah Synagogue's Progressive Singles. The group offers "a way of establishing new connections...in what I would call a safe setting."

The joint effort was the brainchild of Claudette Edghill, who serves as Intersynagogue Singles' chair. When Beth Tikvah extended an invitation for a singles event to Adath Israel last year, it occurred to Edghill that even more synagogues could be involved.

Most programs attract 80 to 100 people, and one had about 150.

One of the "wonderful things," said Edghill, is the way the community is working together. Food at all the programs is kosher, she noted.

Sam Wales, chair of Beth Sholom Synagogue's singles committee, said that through the Intersynagogue Singles, he can get help – volunteers, for example – for his synagogue program.

He would like to see the scope of the intersynagogue program expanded even further. "How do we get to those people who are not coming out?" he asks.

As chair of the Intersynagogue Singles' newly formed marketing committee, which has yet to meet, Wales intends to address that issue.

"Jewish singles want to meet other Jewish singles," he said.

Participating synagogues include Adath Israel, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, Beth Tikvah, Beth Torah Congregation, Beth Tzedec Congregation, Holy Blossom Temple, Shaar Shalom, Temple Sinai Congregation and the Lodzer Centre Congregation.

For further information call Adath Israel at 635-5340 and ask for Nilly.

Hart Pomerantz: A funny kind of lawyer

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

Hart Pomerantz

TORONTO — Hart Pomerantz considers himself to be a lawyer by profession, but a humorist by birth.

Either way, Pomerantz convinced a sold-out audience at the the Law School Gala recently, that, he is, in fact, a very funny lawyer.

As the opening number of a show that featured former graduates of the University of Toronto Law School, such as Justice Rosalie Abella, former premier of Ontario Bob Rae, Justice Frank Iacobucci, and University of Toronto Chancellor Hal Jackman, Pomerantz managed to warm up the audience with his self-deprecating sense of humour.

"I don't know how I got into law school," he told the audience who had gathered to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the faculty of law. "I applied to pharmacy."

Pomerantz graduated from the University of Toronto Law School in 1965, and started work as a lawyer at a building at Queen and Richmond. "I spent the first month trying to find my office in that building," Pomerantz said in an interview.

At that time, in the '60s, he said he drifted into criminal law "because there seemed to be more criminals than anyone else."

Pomerantz also began writing and performing comedy. He wrote and performed for the UC Follies and the Russ Thompson Show, and then sold some material to Joan Rivers and Woody Allen.

"By 1968, I was in Hollywood writing material for the Beautiful Phyllis Diller Show," he said.

"When that show was cancelled, they forgot to tell me. So I went into work and found someone else sitting at my desk. I asked for my pen, and left feeling pretty downcast. In the hallway, I bumped into Dan Rowan and Dick Martin.

"Being a lawyer, I yelled 'whiplash. I mean, really, first my show is cancelled, and then I'm assaulted by two big Americans.'

"Within a week, I found myself writing for Rowan and Martin's Laugh-In, the top show in the U.S."

From there, Pomerantz went on to write and produce the Hart and Lorne Terrific Hour, a variety show that featured comedy intermingled with rock. Some of the musicians that appeared on the show were Cat Stevens, James Taylor, ShaNaNa and Lighthouse.

A later show called, This Is The Law, was cancelled by CBC "because of high ratings," Pomerantz said. "They do that sometimes at CBC."

Pomerantz said that making people laugh is therapeutic for himself as well as for the audience. "I hope comedy will be part of medicine one day," he said. "My mother always wanted me to be a doctor."

Hart and his wife Nancy, from Peterborough, have three children – Bill, Shauna and Jennifer. He grew up in Toronto, and is a graduate of the Brunswick Talmud Torah.

While he currently works as a civil litigator, one way he hones the comic side of his personality is by writing short stories.

One story, which he co-authored with Stephen Breslin, is a legal satire about a judge who changes a horse into a bird by judicial reasoning. The story has been published in 22 different journals, including the Harvard Law Record.

Many years ago, Pomerantz recalls driving writer and Nobel laureate Isaac Bashevis Singer, home from a book signing in Toronto.

"Singer said to me: 'So, what do you do for a livink?'

"I answered that I was a lawyer."

Singer then asked, "'There are two kinds of lawyers, crooked or dishonest. Which kind are you?'"

A funny kind, I think.

Couple shares Shabbat food preparation

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

Michael and Joanna Stavsky, a young observant couple in their early 20s, try to share cooking responsibilities.

But Michael concedes that after two years of marriage, Joanna does most of the cooking. However, on erev Shabbat, cooking is very much a "joint venture," he says.

"The division of labour saves time. With both people working, you can get the whole thing ready in 20 minutes and then have time to get ready for Shabbat."

Generally, they clean up together, he says. "Friday, people are rushing about. This chicken recipe is quick. It's ideal for Shabbat.

"We have a routine, where on Shabbat, I'll make a certain kind of chicken and she'll make the side dish."

Michael's dish is a barbecue chicken, he explains. "The main thing is a good barbecue sauce. The sauce I use has a smokey flavour. You baste it on as the chicken is cooking."

The Stavskys use an oven rather than a barbecue, he says. "We live in a small apartment. We're forced to improvise…

"We cook one whole chicken, and leave the oven on all Shabbat. Joanna likes the white meat. I like the dark meat.

"This dish is served garnished with potatoes, and salad with store-bought dressing. We're not that adventurous to start making our own."

BARBECUE CHICKEN

2 to 3-lb. chicken
1 bottle of barbecue sauce
¼ cup of orange juice
½ cup of dry red wine

Place the cleaned chicken in a shallow pan and cover with barbecue sauce (about one-third of the bottle). Add wine and juice. Gravy goes well on rice and mashed potatoes. Initial preparation process takes 8 or 9 minutes.

Start the oven at 400 and put chicken in for half an hour. Turn the oven down to 350 and continue baking the chicken at that temperature. After 1 hour of cooking add the rest of the barbecue sauce. Total cooking time is 2 hours.

When Michael and Joanna have more time, they prepare a spicy cholent recipe. Michael, who grew up in Los Angeles, introduced his father's cholent recipe to Joanna and her family. "I modified it," he say. "There was a lot of experimentation…Mine evolved from his, and I taught it to Joanna."

His secret ingredient is lamb, he says. "I don't use beef. Lamb gives the cholent a unique smell and flavour. Lamb in cholent dissolves almost entirely. It blends right onto the sauce."

CHOLENT

4 whole lambchops (2 to 2½ lb. of meat cut into 1 to 2-inch cubes.
12 to 13 new small potatoes, cleaned and cut in half with skin on
1 package (16 oz.) of cholent mix or two cups total of pinto, red kidney and white beans
½ tsp. of onion powder
2 tsp. of garlic powder
1 tsp. of paprika
1 tsp. of thyme
1 tsp. cayenne powder
2 tsp. all spice
3 tsp. of sugar – 1 bottle of barbecue sauce
3 cups of water
1½ tsp. salt
3 tbsp. kosher hot pepper sauce
2 cups of barley
4 or 5 regular size hot dogs cut into thirds

Rinse beans and soak them in 6 to 8 cups of water. Either pre-soak beans for 6 to 8 hours, or boil them for 2 minutes and let stand 1 hour. Drain and rinse beans.

In a large crock pot add all the above ingredients. Mix well with the addition of each ingredient. Let cholent cook on low for no less than 18 hours. Stir every few hours.

Couple divides up labour

Serves 5 to 6. This recipe freezes well for later use.

Michael and Joanna divide up the labour to speed up preparation. Joanna cuts up the meat and potatoes while Michael adds the barbecue sauce and water, spices, barley and beans.

He says the barley soaks up a lot of water and sometimes the cholent gets dry as it cooks so it may be necessary to add more water.

For her part, Joanna says she tends to do more of the washing and cutting. "Michael is the 'bean person'. He also does the spicing That's his specialty...

"Michael's recipe drives me up a wall. He's always improvising. He usually doesn't measure. He just dumps it in."

She said that before trying Michael's recipe, nobody in her family liked cholent. "We never had a cholent made with anything other than beef.

"When he makes it for the family he sometimes leaves out the hot sauce or adds less. It works fine.

"When we were getting married I told Michael, 'I don't want to do all the cooking. My mother does all the cooking.'

"He told me he likes to cook. He came into the marriage with basic cooking skills."

She said cooking together is more fun. "I do most of the cooking during the week. It's not exactly my favourite thing.

"I believe household responsibilities should be divided equally between husband and wife. Doing the chores is more fun if you can talk together as you do them."

Hamiltonian hopes to renew her Judaism in Israel

This is the first in a series of profiles of Birthright Israel participants.

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jane Shkolnik, a 22-year-old Hamilton native, had little to do with the Jewish community when she was in high school.

"Playing tennis at the JCC, that was pretty much the extent of my involvement," she said.

Shkolnik was one of the lucky Canadians chosen, by lottery, to travel to Israel as part of the Birthright Israel program, launched by Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt. One of the goals of the program is to reach out to unaffiliated Jews.

Shkolnik, who attended Hamilton Hebrew Academy, a Jewish day school, found that when she switched to public school "it wasn't a big deal that you were Jewish anymore...It [being Jewish] didn't come up in everyday conversation, she said.

She did not realize how important Judaism was to her until she moved back to Hamilton last year. Shkolnik had left Carleton's University's industrial design program to decide on a different career path, and found herself surrounded by few Jews because her Jewish friends were away at university.

As Shkolnik puts it, the eight months she spent in Hamilton in between studying at Carleton, made her realize what it is like not to have "a Jewish social safety net."

She remembers the time she told a non-Jewish friend she was going to synagogue on Saturday, and her friend asked, "What's a synagogue"?

Several incidents, she said, opened her eyes, and made her want to learn more about Judaism.

Once, one of her friends who comes from a Dutch background, asked Shkolnik questions about Judaism, and she did not know the answers.

While working at a sporting goods store as a manager, a co-worker, Kevin, asked why she was working in retail when she had been trained in industrial design. She responded that she was deciding which career direction she should take.

Jane Shkolnik

"He knew I was Jewish, and he said 'Jane – you're Jewish, you have to finish school. It's part of your culture," she said.

After these experiences, she decided to research Judaism. She went to Chapters bookstore and the McMaster University bookstore, and read everything she could get her hands on about the religion.

"In Hebrew school, you're 12 when you read this stuff and it doesn't always stick in your head," she said.

From this initial research, Shkolnik became so immersed in Judaism that she decided to return to Carleton University last month to study religion.

She feels this studying will enrich her Israel experience.

"I know the history behind every single spot I'm visiting. It's a really big deal for me," she said.

She was supposed to visit Israel about four years ago when she and a friend decided to tour Israel for one month, and Europe for two.

"We had the tickets, everything was set," she said.

But two days before her flight, there were bombings in Tel Aviv and her parents were worried about her travelling to Israel, so she spent three months in Europe instead.

She has never been to Israel, and is interested to see how people of so many different cultures and religions co-exist in such a small area of land, she said.

Shkolnik is especially interested in meeting the cross section of Jews from different parts of the world, such as Ethiopia and Russia.

"Here is a bunch of people and the only thing they have in common is the fact that they are Jewish – that is pretty cool," she said.

Birthright Israel beckons

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

I walked into a small room at Adath Israel Congregation and scanned the three rows of twenty-somethings.

Comment

To my relief, I recognized one face – a girl who attended A.Y. Jackson Secondary School back in my high school days.

I later recognized two other graduates but the rest of the crowd were strangers – strangers with whom I would be spending 10 days in Israel, trekking in the Judean Desert, touring the Old City, exploring a Golan Heights winery, as well as other exhilarating adventures.

I attended this pre-program, a few weeks ago, because I am one of 1,000 Canadians visiting Israel this month as part of the Birthright Israel program, a project launched by Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt, to bring young Jews from the Diaspora to Israel.

I have never been to Israel and while I am excited about visiting this Jewish homeland, I have to admit to having one tiny, nagging fear: What if I am not spiritually or emotionally moved by Israel? What if I don't feel what I'm supposed to feel or I feel nothing at all?

In an article in the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, an American participant of the Birthright trip was interviewed in Jerusalem and articulated a similar feeling.

She had just visited the Western Wall and said: "I was expecting to have this big profound experience, like I was going to get to the Wall and then tears were going to come, and it didn't happen. I was really upset. Actually, that made me cry, that I didn't feel anything."

What scares me is that because I am a Jew visiting Israel, people expect me to experience a spiritual moment that will alter the course of my life.

I was discussing this fear with our copy editor, Carolan Halpern, on the way home from work two weeks ago and one bit of wisdom she imparted eased my anxiety.

She said many people she has spoken to who have visited Israel experienced a moment or an aspect of the trip that stayed with them for life, even if they did not have a spiritually awakening episode.

So, that got me thinking, maybe I won't wail at the Western Wall or have a spiritually charged life-changing moment.

But I'm sure something – a moment, a site, a conversation – will touch me in a way I will remember for life.

In future issues of The CJN, I will file reports of my experiences on the Birthright Israel trip.

Quebec man allegedly served in Nazi police unit

MONTREAL — Citizenship and Immigration Canada is seeking to denaturalize a second Quebecer for allegedly lying about his past Nazi ties to enter Canada.

On Jan. 31, 80-year-old Walter Obodzinski was charged in Federal Court with concealing his membership in a Nazi-run police unit in Poland when he applied to come to Canada after World War II.

He was granted Canadian citizenship in 1955, and has lived on Sillery Street in St. Leonnard for the last 25 years with his wife and daughter.

In 1997, Vladimir Katriuk was the first Montrealer charged with similarly lying about his Nazi past to enter Canada in 1951. He was convicted in January, 1999, and was stripped of his citizenship. He is now facing deportation.

According to court documents filed by federal prosecutors, Obodzinski allegedly joined the police unit in his native Poland in 1941, two years after the German occupation.

Forced labour camps

The unit, one of many used by the Nazis to fight partisans and eliminate political enemies, was implicated in the murders of 4,000 Jews and partisans and in sending 20,000 men, women and children to forced labour camps.

The documents state that Obodzinski was born in the Polish village of Turez, which was under Soviet control when the Germans invaded.

In 1944, Obodzinski, the documents say, transferred to France, joined the French resistance, and then later a Polish unit under British command.

The Crown is alleging that Obodzinski must have hidden his past or would never have been allowed into Canada.

His was the 17th deportation case brought to court as the result of work done by the federal War Crimes Unit.

Bessie Cohen

101-year-old imparts her words of wisdom

By MOURA WOLPERT

HAMILTON — The winner in a recent Words of Wisdom contest was 101-year-old Bessie Cohen's Life Story Documentation.

The contest was an International Year of the Older Person project of the Ontario Community Support Association and the Ontario Association of Non-Profit Homes and Services for Seniors.

The contest was sponsored by Private Recipes Ltd., a company producing meals specifically designed for seniors and Canada's largest supplier of Meals on Wheels.

Cohen imparted her words of wisdom to Barbara Edmond, a third-year McMaster University gerontology student.

Cohen became a resident of Shalom Village in 1988 and since 1996, she has been living in the adjacent nursing home.

Family is very important for happiness, says Bessie Cohen, and so are celebrations with family. However, it is not enough for the generations to remain close, she adds. "The young must be sure to respect their elders. Appreciate and value your family as well as your neighbour."

Never stop being physically active and socially involved, says Cohen. This is advice she follows herself. Active and involved all her life, "Bessie does not let anything, let alone mere age, stop her from having fun and interacting with friends," wrote the McMaster student.

Cohen's daughter, Gerri Goldberg of Dundas, Ont., calls her mother a people person, who likes having people around her and helping people.

Born in Lithuania, Cohen immigrated to Canada in 1913, joining family members in Hamilton, who were already settled here. She recalls much singing and dancing and celebrating on board ship to Canada.

In Hamilton, Cohen married Sol Sachs, a plumber, and together they raised a son and daughter. She is the proud grandmother of six and great-grandmother of 11. Sol died in 1947.

Cohen became an active member of Pioneer Women and was, says Goldberg, "a fabulous ticket seller. Nobody ever refused her." She was also, and still is, a wonderful baker and particularly enjoyed baking for various fund-raising projects.

In fact, says Goldberg, her mother still does some baking in the nursing-home kitchen although failing eyesight is beginning to make it difficult.

Stay involved for as long as possible by participating in activities that you enjoy, Cohen says to the young. "Family, community and continued activity are sure to bring anyone personal joy and delight. These are necessary ingredients for life, because happiness is the key to life."

Coast to Coast

CJC Archives to stay put

MONTREAL — The recently renovated CJC National Archives will continue to call the Samuel Bronfman House "home" due to an agreement between Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and Concordia University.

Several Concordia departments, including the Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies and the Montreal Institute for Genocide Studies, will also be housed in the building.

The CJC Archives, which has the largest collection of documentation on Canada's Jewish community, will remain under Congress ownership and administration.

The CJC National Archives includes work areas designed to accommodate individuals, as well as student groups. Shelving areas have been added to make the rare documents more accessible.

"The new partnership with Concordia University places the archives into a vibrant academic setting ... [and] will positively affect the whole field of Canadian Jewish studies," said CJC Archives Committee chair, Dr. Norma Joseph.

National Archives director, Janice Rosen, and Concordia Institute chair, Norman Ravvin, have begun developing projects involving greater student use of the collections.

Last semester, a course on Jewish history in Quebec included a session at the National Archives. A joint launching of a book on anti-Semitism in the Social Credit party is planned for the spring.

In the past year, groups, including Jewish and non-Jewish high school and CEGEP students, have participated in programs about the history of anti-Semitism.

Non-Jewish francophone and anglophone adult groups have also visited the CJC National Archives in order to learn about Jewish culture and community institutions.

The Archives have recently received several new collections. Notably, a document and photographic record of the Lord Reading Yacht Club since its inception in 1946, compiled by the late Henry Vineberg, archivist and historian.

Norman Ravvin (at left) with students from his class on Quebec Jewish history, attend an orientation session at CJC National Archives, hosted by Archives director Janice Rosen (at centre).

UJA Federation meets

By WENDY GOLDBLATT SCHNEIDER
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Promoting dialogue among the Jewish community's various constituencies and raising awareness of the role the federation can play in unifying the community are among the goals of incoming federation president, Harvey Waxman.

At the UJA Federation of Hamilton annual general meeting last month, Waxman, a former JCC president with a long history of community involvement, outlined his vision for the next two years.

He said he believes fragmentation is the single biggest challenge facing the community as it confronts the changing demographic realities that have seen an annual death rate far outnumbering the birth rate. Waxman sees the federation facilitating a process by which community groups will come together to dialogue, set aside their differences and set priorities for the future health of the community.

Outgoing president Cheryl Greenbaum reviewed the accomplishments achieved during her tenure. She thanked her campaign team and fellow board members, whom she called "an amazing group of people working together for the sake of a caring and cohesive community," and spoke with pride about the community's flourishing Jewish schools, agencies and organizations.

She made special mention of two recently launched initiatives that she said will help ensure the health of the community for future generations.

The first is an endowment fund, the interest from which will ensure the ongoing funding of local projects.

The second is the Dor L'Dor Initiative, a program that seeks to reach out to a generation that has, until now, been reluctant to step into leadership positions in community institutions and develop as future leaders.

Greenbaum also referred to a November small Ontario communities mission to Israel and the former Soviet Union, an experience, she said, that had an impact on all those who went.

Hamilton participants in the mission personally delivered $12,000 raised at last year's UJA walkathon to a social service centre that feeds and cares for elderly Jews in Kiev.

The mission, said Greenbaum, was a wonderful way to end her term.

In a report on the UJA's Campaign 2000, campaign chair, Cele Steinberg, spoke about a narrowly averted crisis that occurred last spring, when a number of large gifts nearly did not materialize. The anticipated shortfall in the campaign's goals prompted several emergency meetings that ultimately served to rally community members, resulting in a campaign that topped the previous year's.

As we all get set for what is sure to be a most feisty session of Parliament, it is time to catch up with who is hot and who is not.

Hot: (Former?) Reformer, Randy White is both "hot" and hot-under-the collar after having been dumped as House leader by Preston Manning. Promising to "set the record straight" on what Manning is really all about, White is seen as an honest and dedicated parliamentarian who is guilty only of having the strength of his convictions.

We would not want to rain on Mr. White's parade, but we cannot resist asking one, tiny question. If there is something to set straight about Manning, why has it taken Randy seven years to finally come forward?

Not: (Former?) Reform cum Canadian Alliance leader, Preston Manning made a big, very big "oops" by firing White (see above). For such a smart politico, Manning immediately sent chills throughout Reform country regarding his threshold for dissent. The trend has continued, and now any voice raising concern about the wisdom of Manning's continued leadership or the merits of the UA, risks "punishment." Just ask Edmonton MP Ian McClelland, who offered a career-limiting opinion that perhaps the new party should have a new leader to really set it apart from its Reform ancestor.

Hot: Rookie MP Irwin Cotler has used the two-month winter recess (my kid wants to know why he only gets two weeks?) to travel hither and yon, meeting with academics, students throughout the country, even squeezing in time to meet international conferenciers in Europe. His political manager, well-known Montrealer, Berl Wiseman, can, apparently, hardly contain the man. It has been a long time since such energy has been seen on the Hill…and people have taken notice.

Not: Jean Pelletier, the PM's chief of staff, who blew the call on tax breaks for-NHL teams, and then froze during the Billion Dollar scandal. Luckily, Fast Eddie Goldenberg has picked up the ball. The scandal may not have died down, but a lot of people are going to owe Goldenberg big time for his adroit management of the issue.

Hot: Gilles Duceppe, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois who stared-down that multicultural benefactor, Jacques Parizeau at the Bloc's recent convention. With that move, Duceppe has finally emerged as a leader that all Quebec nationalists can respect…except for those who really do want to separate from Canada.

Montreal General Hospital program aids stutterers

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — As a teenager, the sound of the phone ringing struck panic in Harvey Shuster. He didn't fear bad news; it was the thought of being unable to utter the word "hello."

Shuster, now 43, has stuttered since he was six. The anticipation of having to verbalize a troublesome consonant could make him tremble with anxiety.

That was until last year, when he enrolled in the fluency treatment program at the Montreal General Hospital, which he credits with finally helping him overcome his speech impediment.

Out of gratitude, Shuster has become a sort of poster boy for the program and has taken it upon himself, in agreement with the hospital, to voluntarily raise tens of thousands of dollars to keep it going.

He has singlehandedly brought in $21,000 for the program, and is not stopping there; he's going for $100,000. What is more remarkable, is that in order to raise this money, he made over 720 phone calls, many of them cold, to businesses, agencies and individuals, as well as to the media.

He spoke in the slow, deliberate way he was taught, no longer self-conscious about what people might think.

Approaching people this way would have been almost unthinkable only a couple of years ago because of his stuttering, which he describes as a severe disability.

There's no cure for stuttering, and like many other sufferers, Shuster's speech did improve after different types of therapy over the years, but after a few weeks, he slipped back into stuttering.

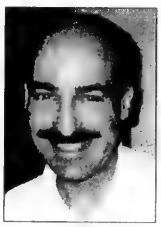
The Montreal General program is different, he says, because it teaches, not only the techniques of fluency, but also addresses the psychological and emotional aspects that often prevent stutterers from using the skills they've acquired when in uncomfortable situations.

In conjunction with the intensive therapy, participants immediately begin attending a self-help group, which they can continue with after they "graduate."

"Using your techniques at home or in ideal circumstances is one thing, but in the real world it is difficult to put into practice what you theoretically know," he said.

Today, Shuster still occasionally stumbles over words, but he knows what to do to get himself out of these lapses, and he's not embarassed to do so anymore.

"This speech program, unlike previous speech therapy methods I followed, has benefited me greatly. I can speak with controlled fluency in most situations in daily life. I'd say, that in 50 percent of pressured situations I can master the techniques. Before, it was virtually zero," said Shuster, who works in the financial department of Air Canada.



Harvey Shuster

"This is the only hospital in Quebec that currently has this self-help program supervised by a speech therapist, and it is vital to maintain its existence."

Jill Harrison, the director of the Montreal General's speech pathology department, congratulates Shuster on his efforts. "In doing so, he has become an ambassador for the program and for the hospital, educating hundreds of people about the nature and treatment of stuttering. The media exposure and contacts he has made have been invaluable in dispelling myths about people who stutter, and in offering hope to those unaware of our services."

Shuster would like to spare other children from the humiliation he suffered growing up. "Children can be very cruel. They imitated the way I talked," he said. "When we had to read out loud in class, I always hid behind my book, hoping not to be called on."

Shuster went on to earn a BComm in accounting and a certificate in management accounting at McGill University. Finding a job, however, was always difficult because doing interviews filled him with dread, worsening his stuttering.

At his bar mitzvah, he still recalls with horror that the last word he had to say was 'righteousness' and he could not get it out.

After years of on and off therapy, Shuster "gave up and accepted that I was a stutterer" for 14 years. That was until February 1999, when he began the Montreal General program.

"It was music to my ears when I heard that it taught not only techniques, but also addressed aspects like attitude and self-esteem."

Shuster says he has also found the courage to set straight, people who finish his words or sentences. "Doing that tells me you don't have the patience to listen to me. I just say, 'Excuse me, but I have not finished what I wanted to say."

Ontario's position called 'shameful'

within Canada, decisions regarding education are ultimately for the provinces to resolve in accordance with their constitutional authority."

The response then conveys Ontario's position, which is that the province "has no plans to extend funding to private, religious schools, and intends to adhere fully to its constitutional obligation to fund Roman Catholic schools." Ontario also reaffirmed its commitment to the public education system.

Canada concludes by stating that it "affirms its commitment to the international human rights regime, and will continue to work with the provinces to this end."

That had community officials stunned.

The announcement was "shameful and disappointing," said Keith Landy, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, on behalf of the recently-formed Coalition for Justice in Educational Funding. It is "as much a non-decision as it is a decision."

Canada has held itself out as a champion of human rights for decades. Now, it's "particularly disappointing to learn it lacks the political will to remove discrimination at home," he added. "Surely it can't be an answer to say that education falls to the provinces, and therefore [the federal government] is powerless to act."

He confessed the response caught him by surprise, as some community officials had predicted Ottawa would ask the UN for more time to craft an answer.

"It's certainly a disappointment, but it doesn't end the matter. It's one more setback in a fight that has lasted 25 years."

Waldman, too, said he found the response "really quite shameful. It doesn't make me feel like a proud Canadian."

He pledged that "pressure will not cease on the federal government, either from parents' groups or organizations. This answer does not get them off the hook."

The question now, said Bayefsky, "is how is Canada going to retrieve its standing in front of the international community?"

She said the UN will duly note that Canada has defaulted on one of its findings. The special UN rapporteur for human rights will hold a follow-up meeting sometime in March, she said.

"At some point, [the UN] will call in Canadian diplomats and Canada will be listed in a report in violation [of human rights statutes.]"

Canada's credibility on the international stage has been diminished, she said.

But, "this isn't the end of it. Now, it's up the prime minister and his cabinet to fashion a remedy."

The public's disappointment over Ottawa's response was registered at a rally of multi-faith parents Saturday night in Vaughan. Over 2,000 people crowded a conference centre to denounce the response and to call on all parents of children in independent schools to maintain a pressure campaign.

EDDIE & CHERI RESTAURANT TOURS

Gotham Grill's best- loved specialty is baby back ribs. The steaks, from only the best cuts, are also popular; and many patrons go for the stir fries and brick oven- baked pizzas. The salads are truly special; the Gotham Greek, for example, boasts a dozen vegetables, abundant feta cheese, and creamy garlic dressing.

Gotham is a neighborhood establishment, with moderate prices and friendly service. People who arrive looking rushed, stay awhile to relax. The walls show photos from the '40s and '50s; you'll hear music from that era too, like the Mills Brothers and the Andrews Sisters. And there's a smoking bar.

Mideast peace talks deadlocked on two fronts

By MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Israeli-Palestinian talks appear to be going nowhere fast, and prospects for reviving Israeli-Syrian negotiations appear equally grim.

U.S. Middle East peace envoy Dennis Ross returned home last weekend, after several days of talks with Israeli and Palestinian negotiators failed to secure any breakthroughs.

He had come to the region to help the two sides make progress toward reaching a deadline next week for drafting the outline of a final peace accord.

Instead, he found the two sides unable to break a deadlock on a different issue – namely, which lands would be included in an Israeli withdrawal from an additional six percent of the West Bank.

Palestinian officials want land near Jerusalem, but these areas were not included in the redeployment maps that the Israeli cabinet approved last week.

The argument is a familiar one. It first erupted last November when Palestinian officials demanded a say in which lands would be turned over in a previous Israeli withdrawal. Israel has repeatedly maintained that it has sole say in determining which lands will be turned over.

The earlier dispute was resolved in January, when Israel withdrew from an additional five percent of the West Bank and said it would be open to Palestinian requests for the next withdrawal.

This time around, Palestinian officials have dug in their heels, charging that Israel has turned a deaf ear to their request for areas around Jerusalem. Israel is remaining equally firm in its stance that it will make the final decision regarding its West Bank handovers.

The two sides cannot even agree on the current state of their negotiations: Palestinian officials are saying that the talks are in crisis, but Israeli leaders are downplaying the problems as temporary disagreements.

Meanwhile, both sides – now joined by Ross – are saying that next week's deadline for drafting the outline of a final peace accord will not be met.

At the same time, the Israeli-Syrian peace track – on a downhill course since talks between the two sides were suspended in mid-January – is looking equally unpromising.

Shortly after Syria suspended the talks, demanding that Israel give a written pledge to withdraw from all of the Golan Heights before negotiations resume, Hezbollah increased its activities against Israeli troops in southern Lebanon.

Given the widely held belief that Damascus gave the go-ahead to Hezbollah to step up the fighting against Israel, each new Hezbollah assault makes it harder for Israeli officials to find a way back to the negotiations with Syria.

In the latest of its attacks, Hezbollah detonated a roadside bomb last Sunday that killed an Israeli soldier and wounded at least six others.

Last week, Hezbollah gunmen killed three Israeli soldiers and, in a separate attack, the second-in-command of the Israeli-allied South Lebanon Army.

In retaliation, Israel made a failed attempt to assassinate a senior Hezbollah officer. This prompted Hezbollah officials to threaten to strike at northern Israel with Katyusha rockets.

Meanwhile, a majority of Israelis still support pressing ahead with the Syrian peace track, despite the Hezbollah attack last week that killed three Israeli soldiers.

According to a poll published over the weekend in the Israeli daily Ma'ariv, 67 percent of Israelis want to continue negotiating with Syria, and 61 percent said they believe Israel will be more secure if a deal is reached.

Nevertheless, 63 percent also said Israel should react forcefully to Hezbollah attacks in southern Lebanon.

Austria gov't concerns Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli cabinet Sunday expressed "deep concern" over the establishment of the new government in Austria with the participation of Joerg Haider's ultra-nationalist Freedom Party, but refrained from taking additional concrete action beyond recalling the country's ambassador to Austria, who returned to Israel last Friday.

A communique read out after the meeting by cabinet secretary, Isaac Herzog, stated that the Israeli government considers its "mission" to be "to warn against such a grave phenomenon of a western European government that includes neo-Nazi elements."

The communique added that "the historical lesson of the Holocaust teaches that such phenomena are unacceptable. They have no justification and we must not believe conciliatory words that cover up an ideology that advocates hatred and racism. Such phenomena must be eradicated."

This is a "black day for Austrian democracy," the statement said, and called on all the world's "enlightened nations" to take action and denounce the phenomenon.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak stated in the meeting that in his talks with world leaders, he had made it clear that a consistent and relentless effort to deal with the developments in Austria would be necessary, even if it takes months.

Israel, Barak said, cannot be in a position of "hesitating and stuttering" on this subject.

Industry and Trade Minister Ran Cohen (Meretz) called on the government to break off diplomatic relations with Austria, while Justice Minister Yossi Beilin stated that the new Austrian chancellor, Wolfgang Schuessel, had "sold his soul to the devil" – echoing the judgment in a famous trial of the 1950s in Israel related to the Holocaust – and proposed that Israel re-examine its relations with Austria in all spheres.

Team keeps kippot, forfeits game

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NORFOLK, Va. — The coach of a boys' basketball team from a Hebrew school opted to forfeit a game rather than abide by the referee's request that the players remove their kippot.

Nathan Drory, coach of the sixth-through-eighth grade team at the Hebrew Academy of Tidewater, was preparing his team to play Sweethaven Christian Academy, last Thursday, when the referee told six of his players they could only play if they removed their kippot.

Four of the players are sons of rabbis, and the wearing of kippot is "not something we are going to be flexible on," Drory said. "We're going to wear them."

On Friday, Dick Bowie, commissioner of the Southeastern Virginia Officials Association, defended referee Virgena Norman's decision.

"If the clips were to come loose and stick someone in the eye, our $5 million liability insurance wouldn't cover it," Bowie said.

David Clark, Sweethaven's basketball coach, said his team has played Hebrew Academy in other sports and the issue never came up.

After the forfeit was official, the teams played anyway. Sweethaven won, 33-22.

"They were gracious, they were understanding, they were very good hosts," Drory said. "The kids were great on both sides. Our kids were very happy to uphold something they believe in."

The Week in Israel

Jan. 31

• Alif Gondoz, an 11-year-old Turkish girl who survived that country's devastating earthquake last August was reunited in Israel with members of the Israeli army team that rescued her. She lost her entire family in the quake. She was in Israel for physiotherapy and to be fitted for an artificial foot.

Feb, 1

• U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright described as "ridiculous" a Syrian newspaper article that referred to the Holocaust as a "myth," claiming Israel had exaggerated the Holocaust in order to further its own interests.

Feb. 2

• The Knesset held its first-ever debate on Israel's nuclear policy. While no substantive information was revealed in the debate, it broke a long-held taboo on public discussion of the subject. Israel has never acknowledged possessing nuclear weapons capabilities.

• Two Israeli businessmen were arrested for allegedly selling vehicles and military equipment to Iran. The sales were estimated at millions of dollars and include armored personnel carriers and spare parts. Eli Cohen, 50, and Avichai Weinstein, 32, were detained following an investigation that lasted more than a year and involved authorities in the U.S., Europe and the Far East.

Feb, 3

• Thousands of passengers were delayed at Ben-Gurion International Airport as Airports Authority personnel began a general strike. The union objected to the announcement of bonuses for 80 managerial staff while rank and file staff were being asked to absorb cutbacks.

Feb. 4

• The summit meeting between Prime Minister Barak and Palestinian Authority Chairman Arafat turned into a confrontation over the IDF's next interim withdrawal in the West Bank. Arafat rejected the Israeli withdrawal map owing to Israel's refusal to give him control of the Abu Dis area adjacent to Jerusalem and because Israel did not coordinate the details of the map with the PA.

Iraq's Saddam defiant despite sanctions, raids

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

More than a year ago, in Operation Desert Fox, American and British aircraft bombarded Iraq in a punishing 70-hour offensive. The raids were designed to prod Iraq into eliminating its weapons of mass destruction and long-range missiles. Fourteen months on, Iraq remains defiant and uncooperative, and its leadership firmly entrenched.

The crisis that originally began in August 1990 with Iraq's invasion and occupation of Kuwait has collided with the new millennium and has yet to be resolved. Late last year, the United Nations Security Council voted to establish a new arms inspection system in which the United Nations Special Commission would be replaced by a body known as the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission.

But Baghdad has dug in its heels and rejected the plan, saying it will not allow inspectors back into the country until UN economic sanctions are unconditionally lifted.

And so the impasse between Iraq and the UN festers.

As a result, Iraq is free to rebuild its arsenal of chemical, biological and nuclear weapons. It is a great concern to the Israeli government, not only because Israel was hit by 39 Iraqi Scud missiles during the 1991 Gulf War, but because President Saddam Hussein recently called for Israel's destruction.

Clearly emboldened by its success in defying the international community, Iraq is holding fast to its position in the face of demands to comply with UN resolutions.

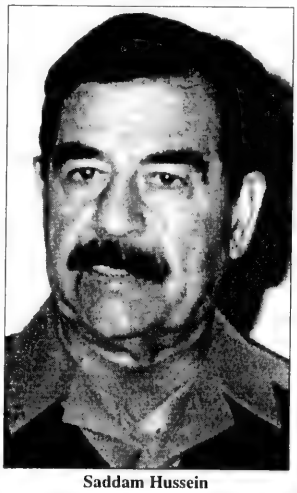
As a realistic diplomatic breakthrough recedes further into the distance, thereby enabling Baghdad to reconstitute its military base, the United States and Britain press on with a low-intensity, little-publicized war against Iraq.

In the past year, since President Bill Clinton's announcement that Desert Fox had inflicted "significant damage" on its weapons programs and military infrastructure, American and British jets have continuously attacked Iraq's air defences in the northern and southern no-fly zones. The exclusionary enclaves, which Iraq does not recognize, were created by Washington and its allies shortly after the 1991 war to protect Kurds in the north and Shi'ite Muslims in the south from repression by Iraqi forces. According to Iraqi figures, the raids, approximately 16,000 in number since Desert Fox in mid-December 1998, have killed almost 200 civilians and wounded twice as many persons.

The United States, Iraq's chief nemesis, defends the air strikes as a measured effort to isolate Hussein and weaken his regime. The policy, however, has not really succeeded, and even Washington tacitly acknowledges that a stalemate exists.

In a remarkable display of resilience, Iraq has not only repaired factories and barracks bombed in late 1998, but rebuilt anti-aircraft batteries, radar sites and communication centres attacked since 1999.

And because UN arms inspectors have been kept away from Iraq for at least 14 months now, there is no one to systematically monitor Iraq's capabilities, which are purported to be considerable.



Saddam Hussein

During this interregnum, Hussein has bolstered his strength, as Israel has suggested. Until recently, he refused to admit inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency to check Iraq's uranium stockpile.

At the UN, meanwhile, Hussein has cleverly created deep-seated rifts within the Security Council. In addition to denouncing the air raids of the past year, Russia, China and France have urged the United States – the world's sole superpower – to lift sanctions. Most observers believe that these disagreements have had the effect of encouraging Iraq to resist UN pressures still more strongly.

Although sanctions have not deterred Iraq from rebuilding its armed forces, they have impoverished much of its population. The UN oil-for-food program, under which Iraq is permitted to export $7 billion worth of petroleum products annually in exchange for being able to import agricultural, medical and educational supplies, has somewhat eased conditions. But sanctions have enfeebled its economy and isolated Iraq on the world stage.

Despite release of three, Iranian Jews still concerned

BY JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The release on bail last week of three Iranian Jewish prisoners has raised hopes for their future, but there is still concern that they and the other 10 accused of espionage will not receive a fair trial.

Last Wednesday's release followed earlier announcements that a trial is imminent for all 13 of the imprisoned Jews.

"Obviously we're glad about this development, but we can't forget there are 13 people, and we won't start celebrating until all 13 are released," said Sam Kermanian, secretary general of the Los Angeles-based Iranian American Jewish Federation.

The three released are Navid Balazadeh, 16, the youngest of the defendants, his uncle Nejad Bouroghi, who is a religious leader in the city of Isfahan, and Omid Tepilin of Shiraz, Kermanian said.

The 13 Jews – religious and community leaders – have been held in a jail in the southern Iranian city of Shiraz since the spring. They have been accused of spying for Israel and the United States but have not been formally charged. Both Israel and the United States have vehemently denied the accusations against them.

They face the death penalty if convicted.

The three released will still face a trial should the government bring formal charges against them, Kermanian said, "but I'm hoping this indicates that their files, like the others', don't include sufficient evidence to bring charges, and that's why they decided to release them."

Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, said of the release: "If this is a positive message, we receive it as such, but it's a very limited one."

Advocates for the prisoners still worry that the accused will not receive a fair trial.

They also believe a trial is not likely to occur until after Iran's upcoming elections.

Many observers believe that the arrests and accusations are part of a power struggle between conservative hard-liners and President Mohammad Khatami, who has made overtures to the west.

The Feb. 18 elections are being seen as a contest between the two forces vying for power.

Iranian officials have not detailed the evidence against the suspects, but hard-line elements of the judiciary reportedly have said documentation of the alleged crimes proves their guilt.

The case sparked an international outcry, and those working on behalf of the detained have alternated between public and private diplomacy to press their cause.

In recent months, American Jewish advocates – while hoping for the prisoners' release – have also been working to try to ensure that the prisoners receive a fair trial.

"Our preference is they should be released now," Hoenlein said.

"They've suffered enough, no matter what they've done, and none are guilty of espionage."

A trial might be better than endless delays, said Hoenlein, but it "has to be public with representation and outside participation as has been promised all along."

Kermanian agreed, saying a trial presents an opportunity for Iran to "show to the world that it's serious about its declarations regarding the rule of law, its civil rights; or, depending on the outcome, to essentially prove they are not serious."

He expressed concern about the judicial process, especially that the Jews be given lawyers and that the lawyers be given adequate time to review the charges and prepare a defence.

Peace talks coming home

Middle East peace talks are returning to Ottawa this spring.

The Refugee Working Group, one of five working groups that form the multilateral round of peace negotiations, is scheduled to meet in the capital May 16-18. Canada chairs the RWG; it is sometimes referred to as the group's "gavel holder."

The last time the RWG met in Ottawa was 1993. But there have been several rounds of talks in other world capitals since.

Mideast experts agree that the subject of Palestinian refugees – those who fled or were expelled from Israel in 1948 and 1967 – are among the most contentious of the outstanding issues facing Israel.

In a speech in Moscow last week, Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy summed up Canada's contributions to date, and said the beginning of permanent status talks between Israel and the Palestinians "suggests a new phase for the RWG."

Addressing foreign ministers from a dozen other countries which form the multilateral group's steering committee, Axworthy said a solution "respecting the rights of the [Palestinian] refugees, and offering them choices as to their future, is most likely to receive the support of the international community."

Some observers said the reference to offering Palestinian refugees "choices" seems to indicate a shift in Canada's stance. Canada's long-standing policy in the Middle East has been never to pre-judge the outcome of talks.

And by offering refugees a choice, is Canada saying that millions of Palestinians should be allowed to return to their former homes in Israel, if that is their choice?

The Canada-Israel Committee doesn't think so. A CIC official last week, said Axworthy's remark is not all that worrisome, as Canada is more likely to look for practical solutions, in line with the international community, such as allowing Palestinian refugees and their descendants the right to re-locate to third countries, or to compensate them financially.

Indeed, Canada played host last fall to a conference on monetary compensation for Palestinian refugees.

Axworthy listed some of Canada's most visible contributions within the RWG:

• The RWG has visited refugee camps in the West Bank, the former Gaza Strip, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria. These have served as a way for refugees to air their concerns and needs to the international community.

• Canada and Kuwait have funded a project, to be completed by year's end, to repatriate close to 500 Palestinian refugee families from an abandoned military installation in the Sinai called Canada Camp, to Gaza.

• Canada's contribution to UNRWA (the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees in the Near East) has increased more than 40 percent since 1997. And over the past five years, Canada has contributed over $130 million to programs aimed at increasing direct contact between Israelis and Palestinians.

Axworthy also called for collaboration between the five working groups.

The group on water rights will meet in April. The economic group is slated to meet in Jordan May 8; and the environment committee is to meet in Tunisia May 13. Only the group on arms control is still on indefinite hold.

Over the decades, there has been wide disagreement on the number of Palestinian refugees. The UN puts the figure at 3.5 million (including those displaced by the 1967 Six Day War). Israel estimates the total is around two million, while Palestinians have said the number is over five million.

Following the 1948 War of Independence, 726,000 Palestinians became refugees. Only 156,000 remained in Israel proper.

Israel has always categorically ruled out the right of Palestinians to return to their pre-1948 or pre-1967 homes because the resultant influx of millions of Arabs would threaten the Jewish majority – and thus spell the end of the Zionist dream.

But since bilateral and multilateral peace talks began in 1991, Israel has become more receptive to the compensation of Palestinians who lay claim to pre-state property or who have suffered as a result of being uprooted.

Estimates of financial compensation have ranged from $7 billion to $10 billion.

Mr. Death a study in vanity and self-deception

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A mouse of a man, Fred A. Leuchter, Jr. is a specialist in "humane execution systems." He designs and repairs gas chambers, electric chairs, lethal injection devices and gallows. Not the sort of guy, you'd think, who'd seek out publicity.

Yet, perversely enough, Leuchter went out of his way to call attention to himself. In an incredibly naive act of self-destruction which ruined his career, he aligned himself with the forces of darkness – Ernst Zundel and his band of Holocaust deniers – by writing a report supposedly proving that the Holocaust never occurred.

Leuchter's fatal foray into Holocaust denial is the subject of Mr. Death: The Rise and Fall of Fred A. Leuchter, Jr., a surprisingly droll and ironic documentary by Errol Morris scheduled to open in Canadian theatres on Feb. 11.

By taking Leuchter at face value, Morris lets him destroy himself in piecemeal fashion. By the time he is through with this pathetic creature, Leuchter emerges as a misguided figure of ridicule who can only blame himself for his precipitous downfall.

A study in vanity and self-deception, Mr. Death begins as a straightforward profile of a geeky, self-satisfied technician who describes his calling in clinical detail. Leuchter – who drinks 40 cups of coffee and smokes six packs of cigarettes a day – professes to be a proponent of capital punishment rather than "capital torture."

As he casually discusses "the mechanics of execution," Leuchter, a resident of Malden, Mass., comes across as an individual who genuinely believes that he is doing the world a great service. Indeed, he conveys the earnestness of a virginal choir boy who can do no wrong.

Thirty minutes into Mr. Death, Zundel – the German-born, Toronto-based neo-Nazi propagandist and publisher – appears malevolently on screen. It is 1988, and Zundel is on trial for spreading false information with the intent to incite racial hatred. He needs an expert witness to disprove the historically established fact that Jews were gassed at Auschwitz.

In short order, Leuchter accepts an assignment to examine the "alleged" gas chambers at Auschwitz. He goes to Poland with his new bride, a genial Dunkin Donuts waitress whose grasp of geography and history is as uncertain as his own. As might be expected, Morris mines the absurd comic possibilities of this situation to the hilt.

Leuchter, the self-styled forensic investigator, methodically takes illegal samples at Auschwitz and Birkenau in an attempt to show that the walls of the gas chambers contain no traces of cyanide.

Back home in the United States, Leuchter has them tested. Claiming that the tests vindicate his theory that no gassings took place in Auschwitz, he publishes The Leuchter Report: The End of a Myth, which is praised to the heavens by Zundel, British revisionist David Irving and their ilk.

Although the report takes its loathsome place in the pantheon of Holocaust denial literature, the judge in the Zundel trial treats it as information and not as evidence, and Zundel is eventually convicted.

Leuchter's credibility is also tarnished by a chemist who declares that the laboratory tests which scrutinized his samples were unscientific. His reputation is further undermined by a historian who questions Leuchter's research methods. If Leuchter had bothered to look, he would have found irrefutable evidence about gassings under his nose, in the archives of Auschwitz.

If nothing else, Mr. Death is a cautionary tale. After he is interviewed on prime-time television, Holocaust survivors and Jewish organizations take aim at Leuchter's credentials.

It is all downhill from there. He is indicted in Massachusetts for practising engineering without a licence. As a result, Leuchter loses prison contracts and his business flounders. In a final indignity, his wife divorces him, as his life lies in tatters.

In self-defence, Leuchter claims that he is not an anti-Semite, just a man looking for the truth.

Regardless of whether Leuchter is sincere, it is abundantly clear that he is a simple-minded naif, as well as the author of his own misfortune. That, essentially, is the resounding message of Mr. Death, a documentary which rivets the imagination.

Leuchter a 'self-absorbed person,' director says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Fred Leuchter, Jr. did not know what he was getting into when he foolishly aligned himself with Canadian Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel, says Errol Morris, the director of Mr. Death, which opens across Canada on Feb. 11.

Vanity propelled Leuchter into an ill-fated relationship with Zundel and his band of Holocaust deniers, said Morris in a telephone interview from his home in Cambridge, Mass.

Morris' documentary, which has garnered favourable reviews in the United States, is a chilling and ironic portrait of a man who ruined his career as an execution technician by associating himself with the likes of Zundel and company.

In 1988, Zundel, on trial in Toronto for publishing false information about the Holocaust with intent to incite racial hatred, hired Leuchter to conduct a forensic investigation into the use of poison gas at Auschwitz.

After taking samples from the former concentration camp and having them tested, Leuchter concluded that gassings never took place there. His findings were published in The Leuchter Report, hailed by Zundel and revisionist British historian David Irving as a refutation of the Holocaust.

Morris, who describes Leuchter as a vain, self-absorbed person who wears blinders, said he continues to be "totally oblivious" to the moral dimensions of his activities on behalf of Zundel.

To this day, despite evidence to the contrary, Leuchter maintains that no gassings took place in Auschwitz.

Given what he has done, Leuchter is a "de facto anti-Semite," said Morris, who is Jewish and whose Polish-born mother lost relatives in the Holocaust.

Yet, he added, Leuchter is not an ideological anti-Semite. In his conversations with him, Leuchter never uttered anything that could be construed as explicitly anti-Semitic, noted Morris.

"Leuchter believes that what he is doing is heroic."

Morris was careful not to portray Leuchter in satanic terms. "It's scarier to see Leuchter as a person rather than as a demon."

Leuchter still lives in Malden, Mass., next to his mother's house. "His work in execution technology is over. He's working on what he claims is the world's fastest modem."

Play takes an analytical look at brides

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Gabrielle Epstein in Trousseau-True Nature running until Feb.12.

TORONTO — It will be anything but hearts and flowers that the audience sees in a new play called Trousseau-True Nature.

The Toronto premiere is a co-production by Urge and One Yellow Rabbit's High Performance Rodeo of Calgary. The play ran in Calgary in January.

"I think people are confused about marriage and its relationship to love," said Gabrielle Epstein, who appears as a singing, dancing and clowning bride.

"It's a blown-up exaggeration of the whole marriage process," she said.

A graduate of Toronto's Ryerson Theatre School in 1989, Epstein is a performance artist who has trained in Canada, England and the United States.

She has been a teacher of yoga, something she has brought into her work with Urge, which she joined in August, 1998.

Women improvise their differing theatrical skills and she said that she has found a forum with Urge to develop and express her creative experiences and interests.

Epstein has always explored her love for improvisation, movement and the visual arts through collaborations with various Toronto fringe companies and experimental filmmakers.

Trousseau-True Nature takes an analytical look at brides, exploring their internal emotions, but not without humour, as the four brides also play the instruments of a wedding band at a country reception hall and later morph into animals.

The bride's flower bouquet, traditionally a source of much interest at every wedding, lands in the audience, with hilarious results.

The other brides are played by Katherine Duncanson, Fides Krucker and Linda Catlin Smith. The director is Joanna McIntyre.

Trousseau-True Nature, running as part of the du Maurier Theatre Centre series at Harbourfront, Feb. 9 to 12. Tel. 416-973-4000.

Actor/playwright scores theatre double-header

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Actor and playwright, Alex Poch-Goldin has two plays in the same theatre and they're running at the same time.

Both plays are about people on the lower echelons of power in their respective societies.

Upstairs in the Factory Theatre Mainspace, Poch-Goldin has a lead in Belle, a play about blacks fighting for their rights in post Civil War America. It runs from Feb. 10 to Mar. 5, coinciding with Black History Month in Ontario.

Poch-Goldin's play, Jim and Shorty, about the powerlessness of a native Canadian and two retirees, is running downstairs in the Factory Studio Theatre from Feb. 3 to 26.

Belle, written by Torontonian Florence Gibson and directed by Ken Gass, takes place in the mid-1860s, a volatile time for blacks. The play highlights the tribulations of blacks during that period.

The action centres on a black woman and her husband as they make their way north after the Civil War, crossing paths with a white suffragette, and J.T. Lackley, the character played by Poch-Goldin.

Lackley, an ambitious young Republican upstart, tries to convince blacks to support his party. He returns to the south disillusioned about politics, his scheme to trap the black vote in shreds.

"But even Lackley is not a villain in the true sense, because he acts true to his own experience," Poch-Goldin told The CJN.

He also spoke about Jim and Shorty. After a successful run at last summer's Fringe Festival, Jim and Shorty has been extended by Poch-Goldin into a full-length play.

Big Tom, the native Canadian character, had only one short speech in the original play, however, he was given a major part in the extended version.

As an actor, Poch-Goldin may be remembered by Toronto audiences for his portrayal of Louis Ironson, the sensitive artist, in Angels in America.

Mr. Death the author of his own misfortune

Although, in Morris' words, Mr. Death depicts Leuchter as a "misguided idiot," Leuchter liked the film. "He thought it was fair."

Zundel, from whom Morris bought clips of Leuchter at Auschwitz, liked it as well. "Talk about being damned with great praise," said Morris.

He disagrees with critics who argue that Mr. Death aids and abets Holocaust deniers by giving them a platform.

"There is a mistaken idea that lies, misrepresentations and untruths just go away if you don't address them. My view is different. When someone says something untrue, you address it. My film makes it clear that The Leuchter Report is wrong, wrong!"

Mr. Death, he explained, ties to understand the mechanics of Holocaust denial, the original perpetrators of whom were the Nazis.

As he sees it, Holocaust denial is losing currency. "People are standing up to it and exposing it as a total lie."

For the first time in years, tourists are returning in fairly significant numbers, although the good old days of the 1960s and 1970s remain a fond memory.

Famous for its stunningly beautiful architecture, its romantic views of the azure Adriatic Sea and its balmy Mediterranean climate, Dubrovnik had the misfortune of being caught in the crossfire between Croats and Serbs when Yugoslavia broke up in a welter of recrimination.

During the Serbian siege, shells rained down indiscriminately on the city, claiming the lives of 391 civilians and soldiers and causing $2.5 billion in damage.

Never before in its long history had Dubrovnik been so violated by warfare.

Such was the devastation that seven out of 10 roofs had to be replaced in the aftermath of the fighting.

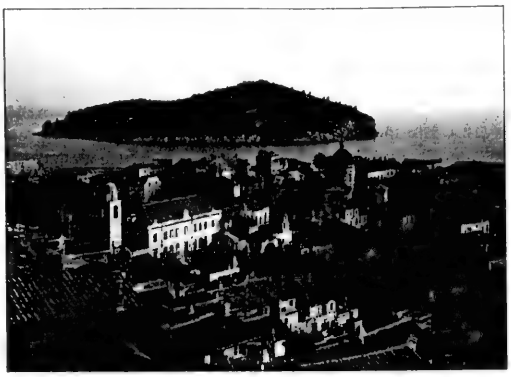
Even Dubrovnik's venerable synagogue – the oldest functioning Sephardi shul in Europe – took a hit.

Now, more than eight years after the catastrophe, Dubrovnik, known for its exquisite walled old quarter, has more or less returned to normalcy.

Streets that were ripped up have been paved over and building facades have been repaired. But one last task has yet to be completed – restoring all the interiors.

By this measure, the synagogue, which survived both a major earthquake in 1667 and the deprivations of World War II, is in a fortunate position. It sports a new red-tile roof and its sanctuary has been refurbished. It is back in business, ready to accommodate local Jews as well as visitors.

The synagogue, on ulica Zudioska, is the most vibrant symbol of Dubrovnik's long-established Jewish community. It is just off the Stradun, the main thoroughfare in old Dubrovnik.



Panoramic view of Dubrovnik [Sheldon Kirshner photo]

Jews have lived here since the 14th century, although a formal community did not arise until the 1500s.

Jewish traders, artisans and professionals were attracted to Dubrovnik, a free city state until the 1808 French occupation, because of its strategic locale.

Free city state

Once called Ragusa, Dubrovnik was on the crossroads between the Balkans and the Mediterranean, an independent republic which prospered as a seafaring power.

Hobbled by disabilities until full emancipation was granted in 1873, the Jewish population of Dubrovnik was never a force to be reckoned with numerically. When Germany invaded Yugoslavia in 1941, it was home to only112 Jews, according to Dr. Bruno Horovic, the community's current president.

Although occupied by the Italian army, Dubrovnik was administered by a fascist Croatian government under the leadership of Ante Pavelic. His Ustashe regime relegated Jews to second-class citizenship, and worse.

Since the Italians had a policy of not deporting Jews to death camps, several thousand Jewish refugees from various parts of Yugoslavia, especially Bosnia, found something of a haven here.

During this period, a local Jewish family, the Tolentinos, removed Torah scrolls, prayer books and ritual objects from the synagogue and hid them for the duration of the war.

The shul itself was converted into a storehouse by the Italians, said Horovic, a man of 75 whose ancestors settled in Dubrovnik in the 19th century, when it was ruled by the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Under German pressure, Italy resettled Jews in Dubrovnik on offshore islands in the Adriatic. Horovic was in an internment camp on the island of Rab when Italy capitulated in 1943. He spent the rest of the war as a partisan in mainland Yugoslavia.

By his estimate, 27 Jewish residents of Dubrovnik were killed before it was liberated from the Germans in 1944.

After the war, some of the survivors left Yugoslavia, immigrating to Israel. Today, a grand total of 44 Jews live in Dubrovnik, renowned for its steep cobbled streets, its quaint narrow lanes, its Gothic and Renaissance facades, its picturesque marina and its high defence walls.

These walls, which are over two kilometres long and up to 25 metres high, encircle Dubrovnik and can be walked. It makes for a wonderful stroll, particularly on a warm, sunny day.

Sixth Annual CJN Purim Art Contest

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 16. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small or too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, February 21, 2000. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: Children will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 3, 2000.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 16, 2000. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Congratulations

Hashomer Hatzair / Camp Shomria

Camp Shomria offers a dynamic and exciting summer camp experience for youths 8-16 from Canada, the U.S., and around the world. A variety of challenging sports, theme days, educational and cultural activities create an atmosphere designed to build life-long friendships. It's located on Otty Lake, a beautiful waterfront, ideal for a wide selection of fun-filled water activities.

Camp Shomria promotes deep love for Israel and the North American Jewish community. It's run by the Hashomer Hatzair Youth Movement, established over 80 yrs. ago, and is active within the Jewish community. There are weekly activities available throughout the school year in Toronto and a 6-day residential winter camp during December. Activities include dance, arts & crafts, a dynamic drama program, hikes, trips and a rope course (see directory). Grade 10 graduates participate in a leadership training program, "Yedid Plus", which includes an intensive 5 wk. itinerary in Israel.

Staff are dedicated and committed. Most were Shomria campers. Camp Shomria has a full-time registered nurse, and many staff are trained in first aid. A hospital with modern facilities is just minutes away. To learn more about Camp Shomria, please call Noam or Miriam at 416-736-1339.

Think high: think Aviation International

Do you ever dream of flying — soaring above the clouds, as the land spreads out below you in a quilt of fields and city blocks?

If the answer is yes, call Adele Fogle at Aviation International. Based at Guelph Airpark for over 10 years, and licensed by Transport Canada, Aviation International has participated in Air Cadet training for the past 5 years, graduating 56 cadets.

They also operate a summer camp for 14-17 year olds, to teach the basics of flying, and encourage them to progress further. Ground school teaches radio procedures, airframes, engines, flight theory, regulations, aviation medicine, and human factors in aviation. The 10 hours in-flight training, with a licensed instructor in a 2 seat Cessna 150, can be logged as credits towards a Recreational Pilot's Permit or Private Pilot's Licence Training is thorough and challenging. After 2 or 3 flight hours, a student can maneuver in the air, turning, banking, and changing speed and altitude. Take-offs require somewhat more training; and landing, the most exacting skill, takes 12-13 hours. In-flight training also covers emergency procedures, pre-flight inspections and on-board checks.

After about 14 hours of flight, most students can fly solo. For solo flight, however, one summer camp is not enough and throughout the year, many students return to Aviation International to earn their Recreational Pilot's Licence at a minimum age of 17; and from here, most pilots progress to their commercial licence.

Flying is fun, and also leads to rewarding career opportunities. The older generation of pilots is retiring, leaving many openings for younger people both men and women.

Nor do all pilots fly for commercial enterprises. Aerial photography and remote sensing are used, for example, to measure air pollution. The physical requirements of flying encourage responsibility and a healthy lifestyle. Alcohol and drugs are prohibited while flying; and every permit or licence requires a yearly medical.

This unique camp runs for 12 days starting July 3. For details, call 519-824-2660. Call now, though: there's a 12 student limit, and the application deadline is May 21.

Bishop's College School - An unforgettable learning experience

Bishop's College School is a residential school situated in Lennoxville, Quebec, approximately 160 km east of Montreal.

The 2000 Bishop's College School summer language program (ESL or FSL) which begins on July 2 and ends on July 29, will be our 39th season.

This is a non-credit program for boys and girls ages 11-15 years. It is designed to provide an opportunity for concentrated instruction to well-motivated students interested in gaining proficiency in French or English at the beginner, intermediate or advanced levels. Courses run Monday through Saturday mornings and Monday through Thursday evenings. Teacher to student ratio, approximately 1 to 12.

The sports and recreation program is also an integral part of the formula with afternoons dedicated to supervised team sports and off-campus activities. Sundays are reserved for planned outings and cultural trips are organized as necessary extensions of the language program.

Camp George a Success Phenomenon —and Growing!

You're in good company if you plan to send your child this summer to Camp George — Reform Judaism's first Canadian camp.

From the time it opened in '99, Camp George has been an instant success, offering many children their first chance to develop a day-by-day awareness of Judaism they may have previously experienced only at home or synagogue. The camp, in fact, is almost fully booked already for the coming summer, with waiting lists for some age groups in some sessions.

Situated on a magnificently wooded lakefront setting 2-1/2 hours from Toronto, the camp is designed to help youngsters 8 to 16 years old develop their physical, social and personal skills —all in a supportive, non-competitive and fun environment. Every child's self-image and Jewish identity is also enhanced by being part of a community that includes Rabbis, Rabbinic students, educators and mature youngsters who have chosen to spend their summer working at Camp George.

Every parent can appreciate how important it is to choose the right summer camp for their child. So although Camp George already offers youngsters tennis, volleyball, basketball and multi-purpose courts plus all the boating, water skiing, arts and crafts, camp-outs and indoor/outdoor games children have come to expect from a summer camp, emphasis during the winter has been placed on expansion, adding new cabins and resources to accommodate mushrooming camp enrollment and off-season bookings.

Camp Director Jack Feldman who, besides a Master's Degree in social work, brings to Camp George a wealth of experience drawn from camps in the U.S. and Canada, is urging families to avoid disappointment and get their enrollment applications in as soon as possible for the remaining vacancies.

Families who want additional information or registration forms can contact Camp George at 905-762-1581.

More information and literature is also available from the Rabbi, Educator or President of any Reform synagogue in Canada.

Top camping at low costs

Camp Eitan has been directed by Rabbis Michoel Levine and Moshe Weinberg for the past 21 years.

Both teachers at Eitz Chaim Schools, they offer the most in camping for the lowest price. The prices are the same as last year and include door-to-door bus transportation within a designated area, hot kosher lunches (under COR supervision) and basic instructional swimming.

Also included are gymnastics, overnights, computers, arts & crafts, weekly trips and a varied sports program. The camp is located in Eitz Chaim Schools and offers modern air-conditioned indoor facilities for rainy day activities.

A recent innovation in our boy's division is our baseball camp, offered at our same low price. Coaching, video instruction, practice and game situations are aimed at helping campers at the lower skill levels, as well.

Our older girls' division designed to meet the needs of girls grades 3-5, also offers an optional baseball camp.

In our preschool division, special daily events, preschool classrooms, playground equipment, a weekly theme and a caring staff provide the younger child with a safe and happy summer experience.

Camp Ramah inspires today's youth

Camp Ramah, on Skeleton Lake offers a quality camping program in the framework of traditional Jewish practice. Under the directorship of Rabbi Mitchell Cohen, Ramah offers the total camping experience for children in grades 3-10. Our safe and comprehensive waterfront program staffed by certified instructors is a highlight for our campers. Sports is an integral part of every camper's development, focusing on skills, teamwork, and sportsmanship. Arts activities allow each camper to realize their creative potential through projects, performances, and individualized instruction. Outdoor programs take full advantage of the camp's beautiful setting while raising our camper's environmental awareness. New and improved facilities have made Ramah a wonderful recreational experience.

Judaica, Hebrew, and Israel programming are a regular part of the camp day. Jewish texts are taught by young adults in an informal setting. Hebrew is spoken, heard and often becomes second nature at camp. Shabbat, prayer and ritual observance assume special qualities when experienced and shared with friends.

Ramah continues to offer a unique one month program for campers with special needs. The Tikvah ("Hope") program gives adolescents ages 12 and older an opportunity to enjoy every aspect of camp while defining their own Jewish identity.

Staff is often former campers who return to Ramah because of the deep-rooted commitment to the Ramah environment. Young people develop skills and leadership, enduring friendships and a Jewish consciousness that help them become vibrant members of their family and home community.

Camp Moshava is the Camp of choice!

Camp Moshava, the only Orthodox, Zionist, Bnei Akiva camp in Canada, is situated on 250 acres of beach front property in the beautiful Kawartha Lakes region.

In our continuing effort to improve the camp, we have recently expanded our kitchen facilities and are in the midst of building two state-of-the-art bunks for the 2000 summer season. Says Camp Director Shimmy Wenner "... we are meeting the needs of today's camper as well as increasing enrollment."

Moshava has a Beit Midrash and outdoor Beit Knesset, an unparalleled indoor Recreation Centre featuring a regulation size basketball court as well as an indoor/outdoor stage. The camp boasts an extensive high ropes course, rock climbing wall, mountain biking course and ball hockey rink.

Moshava has a 2 week camper-in-training program designed for grade 2 graduates. The camp's regularly scheduled days include instructional swimming in a heated pool, canoeing, waterskiing, a full sports program, thematic arts & crafts and drama. Special days include colour war, sports day, canoe trips, overnights, hiking, nature trips and horseback riding.

What makes Camp Moshava unique goes far beyond facilities, events and personalities. The atmosphere that exists amongst staff and campers is truly a special one. Only those who have actually encountered a Shabbat at Camp Moshava, can truly appreciate what the experience is like! Camp Moshava is not just a summer camp experience, it's the experience of a lifetime!

At Remediation Plus learning & fun go hand in hand

Does your child show signs of dyslexia? Common signs are problems in translating language to thought (in listening or reading), or translating thought to language (in spelling, writing or speaking).

Sometimes other learning problems, e.g. with math, exist alongside these. Dyslexia is neither a disease, nor a result of low intelligence or motivation. Its causes are differences in the structure of the brain People with dyslexia have unique strengths and weaknesses. Though they learn differently, they often have special talents in visual, spatial and motor integration. Many excel in art, athletics, architecture, graphics, electronics, mechanics, drama, music or engineering.

If your child shows signs of dyslexia, ask Remediation Plus about their summer camp for children from Grades 1-8. Remediation Plus teaches children to overcome cognitive difficulties with the Orton-Gillingham method. Based on 50 years of research at Harvard and Yale, this process has a proven record of success.

The essence of this method is phonemic awareness. Children learn to distinguish the vowels and consonants which make up the sounds, or phonemes, of language — and to grasp them in sequence, understanding language as a series of sounds.

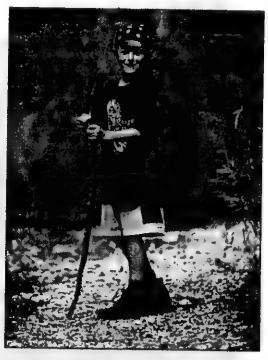
Children are tested before and after the camp. The results must be seen to be believed: skills can improve by as much as 2 grades. Also, the children's progress improves their self-esteem and social skills. The camp runs from 9 a.m.-5 p.m. each day. You can drop your child as early as 8:30 a.m., and pick up between 4:30-5 p.m.

The morning is devoted to language remediation. Following lunch, the afternoon is entirely recreational, full of fun activities such as visits to parks, social events, and day trips, including a visit to a studio. In many afternoon games and events, children have opportunities to use the skills they learn; but the emphasis is on fun. Physical activities include swimming, basketball and other sports.

Remediation Plus keeps mind and body in balance; learning and fun go hand in hand. Staff are professionally skilled, and have strong empathy with children. With 1 counsellor for every 4 campers, your child receives the personal attention that shows he or she is important.

The camp runs for 4 weeks, Tues., July 4—Fri., July 28. Call soon, as the deadline to register is May 1: 416-785-4666.

R+ Remediation Plus Day Camp



Learning has never been this fun!

R+ Camp is a full day camp for children with difficulties in reading, writing, and spelling. Our goal is to assess your son or daughter's difficulties and set customized remedial programs that will have a significant impact on their skills and improve their school performance. Your child will also enjoy a full afternoon of activities, establish new friendships and build their self-esteem.

Camp Shalom - Better than ever at 52

Camp Shalom is getting ready to celebrate its 52nd year in the upcoming 2000 camping season. Located on beautiful Lake Muskoka, the camp has established itself as an exceptional Zionist Jewish camp for boys and girls aged 8-13 in the Gravenhurst area of Ontario.

Shalom campers experience the joys of a terrific summer vacation, under the care of a well-trained staff, with a better-than-3:1 camper-to-staff ratio. As a not-for profit camp affiliated with Canadian Young Judaea and accredited by the OCA, Camp Shalom imbues its campers with a sense of Jewish history, cultural values and the centrality of Israel in Jewish life. The Camp Shalom ethic promotes the ideals of mutual respect, sharing and fair play in interpersonal relationships.

Camp Shalom features an individualized program wherein each child is free to choose from over 25 daily activities including canoe, sailing, ropes, baseball, basketball, tennis, inter-camp sports, archery, self-defense, gymnastics, dance, fitness, beach volleyball, mini-golf, daily instructional swim, waterskiing, kayaking, drama, arts & crafts, photography, expanded tripping program, nature, scouting, music, camp newspaper, sports house leagues, and more. As well, we are proud to announce our new rock climbing, media program and golf activities. The media group will update the Camp Shalom website daily.

The Camp Shalom staff is looking forward to the upcoming summer and the privilege of sharing another wonderful season with so many fortunate campers. Come join our family!

An international camp experience in Israel

Camp Tapuz, established in 1981, brings campers together from as far afield as Los Angeles, Toronto, London, Sweden, Belgium, France and of course, Tel Aviv and Haifa.

Campers join us on our supervised flights, or directly at camp in Israel, where they spend from 1-5 weeks enjoying a unique combination of camp activities and touring Israel. They also enjoy meaningful Jewish and Zionist experiences, visiting the sites of Israel and understanding them through the eyes of their Israeli counterparts.

Accommodation is on kibbutz with all regular kibbutz facilities (clinic, dining-hall, shop etc.) close at hand. Rooms are air-conditioned and sports facilities include swimming pool, basketball and tennis courts, soccer field and a camping ground. Staff are all army graduates with experience in counselling.

There are 4 separate programs for different age groups, as well as activities for the entire camp like "colour war" and "Tapuz Israel day."

Food is kosher and creative, non-denominational Shabbat services are held.

For over the past 18 years, Tapuz campers have forged life-long international friendships, maintained by e-mail, letters and returning to Tapuz year after year. We welcome you to join the world-wide Tapuz family.

See Israel like never before

Betar Israel - Summer 2000 trip: July 9—August 6, ages 15,16-17. The trip is a North American trip and it will leave from airports in Canada (Toronto) and the USA (New York).

In the 1 week leadership seminar program we will join forces with our counterparts in Israel. Israel Betar is one of the biggest and most experienced youth move-ments in Israel. The seminar will be guided by top Israel Betar educators and will include meeting with discussion groups with Israeli youth in your age group. The topics will touch all the major questions that the State of Israel and the Jewish people face today. During the program you will visit interesting sites and important places across Israel. The leadership program will also give you tools to become a young educator in your community.

The 2 weeks touring all over program offers 2 full weeks of touring all the most attractive Israeli sites. Visitg all the "must see" Jewish sites, Jerusalem and the Western Wall (Wailing), Tzfat and its old city. For the nature lovers, the touring will include actually getting off the bus an walking in Israel's wonderful outdoors.

As you know, every Israeli has to serve in the Israeli Army, 3 yrs. for guys and 2 for girls. This 1 week unique outdoor experience program brings you a little closer to understanding this unique experience.You will sleep in tents, learn to navigate and read a map, learn to build a fire and read the stars. The guides of this special program are very experienced and frequently work with youth from the Diaspora.

Lubavitch Day Camp

It is our belief that a camp should do a lot more than just provide fun and games. A Jewish camp should be a place where children can also experience the richness, excitement and warmth of Judaism in a truly enjoyable and unforgettable atmosphere!

We provide hot lunches, door to door transportation, instructional and recreational swimming, a warm Jewish atmosphere, creative playground, arts & crafts, dance, martial arts, sports and much more, for children 2 1/2—12.

The daily schedule runs from 9 a.m.—4 p.m. Monday—Friday, for children ages 5 1/2—12, for 3—5 1/2 year olds the camp day is from 10 a.m.—3 p.m. and our morning program for 2 1/2—3 1/2 year olds runs from 10 a.m.—1 p.m.

We offer large discounts for registration before March 15th and a discount for each additional child.

To receive more information or to register please contact our camp director Rabbi Mendel Bernstein at (905) 731-7000 or 770 Chabad Gate, Thornhill, Ont. L4J 3V9.

Another exciting year at Camp B'nai Brith Ottawa

Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is a privately owned overnight camp located in the foothills of the Gatineaus, 45 minutes outside of Ottawa. We have a long and successful camping history of well over 60 years. Our camp prides itself in welcoming children from all over the world. Although we are a private Ottawa camp we treasure our many campers from Montreal, Toronto, New York, Florida, Israel and even the Caribbean.

Camp B'nai Brith has a varied program to stimulate children with many different interests. We offer an extensive number of different programs such as drama, arts & crafts, dance, tennis, basketball, miniature golf, all camp programs (Grey Cup/Super Bowl, World Cup, Colour War, etc.) and tremendous camp spirit. Our waterfront overlooking the Ottawa River has a sandy beach which is home to our vast watersports. They include waterskiing, windsurfing, kneeboarding, kayaking, canoeing, sailing and a Catamaran. Our Olympic size pool, which has been refurbished this year, allows campers to enjoy swimming away from the hub of activities at the beach. Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is very proud of our extremely successful Red Cross aquaquest program which offers all levels of instruction up to and including Bronze Cross.

Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa offers a kosher kitchen (under C.O.R.) and is also a PEANUT SENSITIVE camp. In addition, we offer a Judaica program which is fun but yet traditional. This includes weekly Shabbat services. We also have an indoor gym, dance studio,recreation hall and an on-site infirmary which has a full time doctor and nurse.

One area we are most sensitive to is the anxiety of our younger campers coming to camp for the first time. To ease this situation we have instituted 2 very successful programs. Firstly, we offer our 2 wk. starter camp for new C.B.B. campers aged 7-10. The other is our Big Brother/Big Sister program which pairs younger campers with older campers prior to and during camp to help campers feel more at ease.

If you are interested in giving your child an active, stimulating and exciting summer camp experience then Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is the place to be. For more information please call Morley Mason at (613) 228-8495.

Israeli camp offers variety and fun

The Ramah Jerusalem Day Camp offers an outstanding Israel-Jewish experience for English-speaking children from abroad, entering kindergarten through grade 8. The camp is located at the Israel Goldstein Youth Village, in the San Simon neighbourhood of Jerusalem, a beautiful, rural site located only 10 minutes from downtown. Campers are taken on 3 outings a week which allow them to explore and discover the magic of Jerusalem and its surroundings. The other 3 days the campers are involved in a rich assortment of fun-filled activities (sports, arts & crafts, nature, music, drama and swimming), many contributing to the Israel oriented theme of the camp. Hebrew language is introduced through songs and games. All this is within an environment of Jewish tradition.

Date and fees of sessions: 1st session, Sunday, July 2-Friday, July 21, $500 per child; 2nd session, Sunday, July 23-Friday, Aug. 11, $500 per child; 1 wk. session/s, Sunday-Friday, $210 per child.

Israel camp for girls fosters individual growth

Overnight camps have long been recognized as an excellent supplement to a year-round Torah education. Camping fosters varied opportunities for individual growth. Group living, independence, formal as well as informal learning, song, dance, drama, swimming, etc. are just some of the benefits offered in this natural surrounding

But ... a new dimension has been added at N'Vei Ashdod. For the past 16 years N'Vei Ashdod has provided all these things, and more .... in Eretz Yisrael where everything takes on a special flavour.

Lively, frum girls from all over the world come to Camp N'Vei Ashdod and forge lifelong friendships. It is indeed rare to find so many girls from so many places, blending so naturally. Perhaps it is the love for Eretz Yisrael which brings them so close together.

Situated in beautiful central Israel, in a tranquil, fully enclosed, modern campus with an enormous pool, beautiful grounds and air-conditioned dining room, N'Vei Ashdod combines learning, sports, fun and excitement with extensive touring throughout Israel.

The girls travel across the country in air-conditioned buses with the finest tour guides available. The whole time, security is top priority.

Shabbos, whether in camp or outside, is particularly special; picture Shabbos in the old city of Jerusalem, or in the Ir HaKodesh of Tzfat. Guest lecturers, Talmidei Chachomim, authors and well known Torah personalities add an extra dimension to the Israel experience.

N'Vei Ashdod, the touring camp for girls ages 10-17 in Israel is now in its 16th summer.

An enriching camp experience

Camp Katonim is a fabulous summer day camp located on majestic Lake Simcoe near Keswick. In a beautiful country setting, less than 40 minutes away from Thornhill, children enjoy an enriching camp experience with full waterfront facilities. Busing is arranged for Thornhill, Richmond Hill, Aurora and Newmarket residents.

The camp, which has about 120 campers, offers a well balanced program with instruction in all waterfront activities, including Red Cross and recreational swim, canoeing, sailing, and waterskiing.

As well, land sports, drama productions, theme days, arts & crafts and Friday evening Oneg Shabbat, are an integral part of the Katonim experience. Campers also enjoy canoe trips and overnights in nearby provincial parks. Camp Katonim offers an overnight camp experience in a day camp setting.

Camp Katonim has 1-8 wk. sessions for children 3-14 years old. There is also a CIT program for 15 & 16 yr. olds. The staff is mature, experienced and energetic, dedicating themselves to ensure that your children have the best camping experience possible.
